At the same time, it should be recognized that our country has a direct interest in seeing the lot of the Soviet Jew improve. Soviet actions against its own citizens are an indication of what to expect of its behavior in the international arena. The more responsible the Soviets become at home, the more responsible they will be abroad. This is the lesson from Sakharov and what is meant by the statement that the Helsinki accords could be the greatest peace document of all time.●

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 127

Whereas, on May 5, 1985, the eighty-five constituent agencies of the Coalition to Free Soviet Jewry (formerly the Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry) will sponsor "Solidarity Sunday" to reaffirm the resolve to secure freedom for Soviet Jews and beleaguered people everywhere;

Whereas Americans of all faiths and from all regions of the country will join with the Coalition on that day in activities expressing the solidarity of our people with the almost three million Jews in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the right to emigrate freely and to be reunited with families abroad is being denied Soviet Jews and others, in clear violation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Helsinki Final Act of 1975 and the Final Document of the Madrid Conference, signed in 1983;

Whereas Soviet Jewish emigration has dropped alarmingly from a high of fifty-one thousand three hundred and twenty in 1979 to just eight hundred and ninety-six in all of 1984;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union has implemented new emigration restrictions designed to make the process of obtaining a visa even more arduous;

Whereas those Soviet Jews and other persons who have applied to leave the Soviet Union have been subjected to expulsion from jobs and schools, exile from major Soviet cities and constant surveillance and harassment;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union is denying all its Jewish citizens even those rights and privileges accorded other recognized religions in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union has sharply increased its discrimination against Jewish culture and religion by arresting Hebrew teachers on false criminal charges, attacking Hebrew teaching circles as "subversive," and promoting anti-Semitic ideology under the cloak of "anti-Zionism";

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union will not succeed in isolating Soviet Jews from friends in the West so long as those who cherish liberty and human rights continue to speak out on behalf of beleaguered people everywhere;

Whereas the recent appointment of Mikhail Gorbachev as General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union renews hope for a United States-Union of Soviet Socialist Republics dialog concerning liberalization of Soviet policies regarding Soviet Jews and other minorities;

Whereas "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" will serve as an expression of our determination to continue efforts to obtain freedom for Soviet Jewish Prisoners of Conscience, to have exit visas granted to veteran refuseniks who have sought permission to emigrate for up to fifteen years, and to secure the free exercise of religious beliefs and cultural expression for all minorities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives supports "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" on May 5, 1985.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to call up the conference report to accompany the bill (H.R. 1869) to repeal the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements added by the Tax Reform Act of 1984, and for other purposes. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MICHEL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, would the distinguished gentleman tell us what we are doing here?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, the bill is pretty consistent with what the House has passed. As a matter of fact, the Senate had receded on most of the amendments that they had offered, mainly because it was not revenue neutral.

This bill, I might suggest, is revenue neutral.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

DR. JONAS E. SALK DAY

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 258) to designate May 6, 1985, as "Dr. Jonas E. Salk Day," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objections to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, as one of the chief cosponsors of House Joint Resolution 258 I rise in full support of the resolution designating May 6, 1985, as "Dr. Jonas E. Salk Day."

Today it is difficult for us to imagine the devastation caused by the polio epidemic. In 1952 this dreaded disease struck over 60,000 persons and killed over 3,000.

The Salk vaccine which was licensed 30 years ago reduced the incidence of polio in the United States by 97 percent and has all but disappeared.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in supporting this resolution which would commemorate the anniversary of the vaccine which ended this terrifying disease of polio as well as the man Dr. Jonas E. Salk for his outstanding contribution to our Nation and to the world.

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, on May 6, 1985, the CUNY Board of Trustees is sponsoring a dinner to honor Dr. Jonas E. Salk on the 30th anniversary of one of the greatest triumphs in the history of medical research—the introduction of the first successful vaccine against polio.

Today, it may be difficult to grasp the enormous fear of the menace of death or paralysis by polio which gripped the Nation before Dr. Salk discovered the vaccine. Polio claimed 60,000 victims a year at its peak. Now, 30 years later, it has long since all but disappeared.

The unveiling of the vaccine set off a nationwide celebration and Dr. Salk was justifiably recognized as a national hero. Never before had the quest for a preventive for a terrifying epidemic disease ended in an interval as short as that of the struggle against polio.

We, as New Yorkers, have reason to be especially proud of this man and his accomplishments. Jonas Salk was born in New York City in 1914, and attended the city's public schools. In his freshman year at City College of New York, his early desire to be a lawyer gave way to his passion for science. He received his B.S. from City College in 1934, and entered New York University College of Medicine and was awarded his M.D. in 1939.

On the occasion of this dinner in his honor, the proceeds of which will support the Jonas E. Salk Scholarships for Medical Study, the House of Representatives passed today House Joint Resolution 258 designating May 6, 1985, as "Dr. Jonas E. Salk Day." In view of this anniversary and Dr. Salk's lifelong accomplishments, it is only fitting and proper that Congress recognize him in this manner.

On behalf of my colleagues, I convey the thanks of a grateful citizenry to Dr. Salk.●

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 258

Whereas Dr. Jonas E. Salk discovered the first effective vaccine against poliomyelitis that was approved for widespread use in 1955 and was awarded a congressional gold medal for the discovery;

Whereas poliomyelitis epidemics were a fact of life in the United States before the Salk vaccine was discovered;

Whereas during the most severe epidemic of poliomyelitis, which occurred in 1952, 57,626 persons were stricken with the disease and 3,330 persons died;

Whereas the incidence of poliomyelitis in the United States was reduced by 97 percent through the use of the Salk vaccine before another effective vaccine against the disease was discovered;

Whereas Dr. Salk still serves the Salk Institute for Biological Studies, which he founded in 1963, as a distinguished professor of international health sciences;

Whereas the Salk Institute for Biological Studies, under the leadership of Dr. Salk, has earned a reputation for being in the vanguard of basic biological research on molecular-cellular mechanisms in genetics, immunology, and neurobiology;

Whereas on May 6, 1985, the City University of New York will host a dinner to honor Dr. Salk, who is a graduate of the City College of New York, and to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the licensing of the Salk vaccine for public use;

Whereas the proceeds from the honorary dinner for Dr. Salk will be used to support the Jonas E. Salk Scholarships for Medical Study; and

Whereas the historic achievement of Dr. Salk deserves recognition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That May 6, 1985, hereby is designated "Dr. Jonas E. Salk Day", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL COMMUNITY COLLEGE MONTH

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 125), designating May 1985 as "National Community College Month," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do not object, but simply would like to inform the House that the majority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I would like to yield to the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. YOUNG] who is the chief sponsor of House Joint Resolution 125.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I am asking for your support today in my effort to declare October 1985 as National Community College Month. Now is the time for us to recognize the contributions that community colleges have made to our Nation, and this bill is a good way to make all of America aware of the importance of community colleges as a part of our fine educational system.

Community, technical, and junior colleges educate more than half of all first- and second-year students enrolled in postsecondary institutions. They prepare people for employment in over 1,400 different occupations, and are usually within reasonable commuting distance for more than 90 percent of all Americans. The cost of going to community, technical, and junior colleges is low, with an average tuition of $501 a year. Black, Hispanic, American Indian, and Alaskan Native credit students are represented at higher than average population rates in these institutions, enrolling more than half of all minority undergraduates attending postsecondary institutions.

More than 97 percent of the congressional districts in the United States have at least one community, technical, or junior college, educating a total of over 11.41 million Americans in 1981 alone. For many of them, it is their first, and sometimes only, chance for postsecondary learning—and they are of benefit to us all.

In the great State of Alaska, we have a network of 11 community colleges, which serve a large number of students who would not ordinarily be able to continue their educations—from teenagers, to senior citizens, to mechanics, to housewives. All of these people want to learn, and because of their different schools' locations, course offerings, and schedules, they are able to do so. From what they discover in community colleges, many students go on to continue their academic careers, while others switch jobs, and yet others continue what they are doing, content in their newfound knowledge. These colleges, which are in varied locations from the farthest northern educational institution in North America, where snow and darkness are the weather words for all of winter, to another in Ketchikan, where the temperature averages in the fifties the year round, with about as much snow as Raleigh, NC, are important parts of their communities. Almost everybody in Alaska, which is almost half the size of the continental United States, lives within reach of these institutions, which means that they have the opportunities that only an education can bring.

Please join me and 223 cosponsors in our support of "National Community College Month." Now is the time to salute community colleges for all of their contributions to this great Nation.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so to make an inquiry of the Chair as to whether or not the unanimous consent is for the purpose of consideration only.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 125

Whereas, in the fall of 1981, there were over 1,219 community, technical, and junior colleges in which 40 percent of all undergraduate college students in the United States were enrolled;

Whereas such colleges prepare people for employment in over 1,400 different occupations or for transfer to 4-year colleges and universities;

Whereas such colleges are within reasonable commuting distance for more than 90 percent of all Americans;

Whereas such colleges provide an opportunity to obtain a post-secondary education at low cost for many people who could not otherwise afford one; and

Whereas such colleges are community-based institutions which provide flexible and diverse programs and services tailored to fit the needs of their local populations and industries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That May 1985 is designated as "National Community College Month", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GARCIA

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARCIA: Page 2, line 3, strike out "May" and insert in lieu thereof "October".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

TITLE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GARCIA

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the title offered by Mr. GARCIA: Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution designating October 1985 as 'National Community College Month.'"

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, on rollcall No. 95 I was unavoidably absent from the Hill in a meeting with the Chamber of Commerce. Had I been present I would have voted "aye."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Speaker, I also was unavoidably absent on rollcall No. 95. I would like the record to show that I would have voted "aye" had I been present.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 1977

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully request unanimous consent of my colleagues that my name be removed as a cosponsor of H.R. 1977.

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AUTHORIZATION ACT, FISCAL YEARS 1986 AND 1987

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 137 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 2068.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2068) to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for the Department of State, the U.S. Information Agency, the Board of International Broadcasting, and for other purposes, with Mr. PEASE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL].

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 2068, authorizing appropriations for the Department of State, U.S. Information Agency, and other purposes for fiscal years 1986 and 1987.

At the outset, I want to express my admiration for the superb effort on the part of the managers of this important authorization legislation: The chairman of the Subcommittee on International Operations, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA]; and the ranking minority member, the gentlelady from Maine [Ms. SNOWE]. They and their colleagues on the subcommittee worked together in a fully bipartisan manner to produce an excellent authorization package for our foreign affairs agencies which is both fiscally responsible and sound in a foreign policy sense.

The bill has already been explained in detail by the managers, so I will take this opportunity to emphasize briefly the following points:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, which I have the honor of chairing, has made a special effort this year to produce authorizing legislation which is supportive of our foreign policy priorities and cognizant of the need to bring down the deficit. As a result this bill and the foreign aid authorization are essentially frozen at the current appropriation levels in the aggregate. Later in the process today the managers of the bill will offer an amendment which will have the effect of exactly freezing the aggregate total authorization in H.R. 2068 at the current appropriation estimate for the programs and operating expenses covered in the legislation. I urge the unanimous adoption of the Mica-Snowe freeze amendment.

This legislation also reflects the continuing interest of the committee in shoring up the security of our diplomatic posts abroad and in combating international terrorism by providing additional funds to increase and strengthen the local security guard program at high threat posts. I would like to commend Subcommittee Chairman MICA for his outstanding performance in this area both through the committee and as a member of the Secretary of State's Advisory Panel on the Security of U.S. Missions Abroad.

H.R. 2068 contains several provisions included in an omnibus antinarcotics bill, H.R. 1768, which was introduced by this gentleman and 14 cosponsors last month. These provisions will upgrade the Department of State's personnel system with respect to its International Narcotics Control Program, require a centralized information sharing system concerning drug traffickers to prevent visas from being granted to known traffickers, and encourage the negotiation of upgraded extradition treaties on narcotics offenses with major drug-producing countries.

Finally, I would like to take this opportunity to commend Secretary of State Shultz for his initiative, in cooperation with the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to upgrade the international communication and information policy function within the Department.

Mr. Speaker, in closing my remarks, I quote Secretary Shultz from his letter to the committee in support of H.R. 2068: "Mr. Chairman, your committee has reported a good bill in harsh times. I appreciate your support and that of your committee. It is an excellent example of bipartisan professionalism." I will include the complete text of the Secretary's letter at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, this is a good bill. It adequately addressed the needs of our foreign affairs agencies while, at the same time, freezing spending levels at current estimates for fiscal year 1985. I urge the adoption of H.R. 2068.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, April 20, 1985.

Hon. DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: As the time for House consideration of the State Authorization bill, H.R. 2068, approaches, I would like to share with you my thoughts on the activities and needs of the Department of State, the Foreign Service and all the other official Americans abroad which this Department services and protects. The State Department title of this bill will have a direct effect not only on the Department's ability to carry out its national security duties, but also on the safety and lives of thousands of official Americans of all agencies who serve in exposed positions abroad.

Mr. Chairman, your committee has reported a good bill in harsh times. I appreciate your support and that of your Committee. It is an excellent example of bipartisan professionalism.

Given the difficult budgetary situation, I made some hard choices in sending up a bill that for the first time in fourteen years is a decrease from the previous year's funding levels for the Department. I had to set difficult priorities; I put first things first. Consequently, I was gratified that your committee recognized my view of our priorities as a principal national security arm of the U.S. Government. Our shared priorities are:

The need to increase the protection for all official Americans abroad (here I welcome your inclusion of funds for additional overseas guard forces), and

The need in these dangerous times to enhance the Department's ability to report on the attitudes and intentions of foreign governments and derive from that information the recommendations that I make to the President.

As I made the difficult choices, I had before me the fact that over the last two years hostile forces had succeeded in killing twenty-one Americans assigned to Foreign Service posts. I do not want that repeated. H.R. 2068 represents the absolute bottom line in resources I believe are needed to increase our security. I have struck a sharp but delicate balance between the resources needed to protect our people abroad and the resources they need to do their job abroad. Any decrease in the overall level of resources will upset that balance. Our budget, which reflects the realities of our operation, is such that the only way we could adjust to additional cuts would be to postpone vitally important security projects.

If our already austere budget is cut further, I will be obliged to tell our people abroad that they will have to continue to run heightened risks, that we cannot provide them with the additional protection that we all recognize they should have. These people are professionals, and I am confident that they will accept those risks, but, I hope we can avoid such a situation.

Mr. Chairman, our needs are clear. We need better reporting and intelligence, we need better analysis, we need to continue to assist Americans abroad, and we need to protect our people who carry out these activities in the most effective fashion. I think it is absolutely essential that H.R. 2068 be approved without any decrease in the Department's funding.

I know you and your Committee share our concerns, and I want you to know, Mr. Chairman, that we appreciate the support you have given us, and we look forward to continuing to work with you.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE P. SHULTZ.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, after 2 weeks we finally come to the floor to discuss this legislation which I think is vital to our Nation and to our national interest.

First I would like to commend Chairman FASCELL for the guidance and wisdom he has offered us in dealing with this legislation. This was the committee the chairman chaired prior to my chairmanship, and he has been invaluable in the information and guidance.

Also I would like to commend my ranking minority member, the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE]. I think it is safe to say that every single issue in this bill has been worked as a bipartisan issue, and every major concern has been worked in a way that I believe the vote was unanimous on every point of contention in the legislation.

I cannot think of an individual who I would have work as the minority member and serve the way she has, in such an honorable and professional way, and I think this bill at this time probably is the best legislation that could come before the House because of the true spirit of bipartisanship and professionalism that has been exhibited by both the minority and the majority, and I truly appreciate it.

Mr. Chairman, what we have before us today for consideration, H.R. 2068, is not the foreign aid bill, I repeat, not the foreign aid bill. H.R. 2068 is the State Department authorization bill which authorizes appropriations for the State Department, U.S. Information Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting.

Title I of the bill funds the Department of State and has direct effect over the Department's ability to carry out its duties.

Mr. Chairman, as I see it, this bill contains funding for two very vital activities of the United States. First, it will allow the Department of State to carry out its national security duties, but also allow the Department to provide for the safety of the lives of thousands of official Americans of all agencies who serve in positions abroad.

Second, it provides the funding for essential modernization and operations of Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, and Radio Liberty.

In VOA alone more than 80 percent of their transmitters are 15 years old or older. In fact, one of the transmitters that America is operating today is a transmitter that we captured during World War II from the Nazis. We are talking about trying to modernize these transmitters and make some changes that are long overdue. More than 35 percent are 30 years old or older. VOA manufactures its own replacement parts for some of its antiquated equipment. Essentially they do this because the people who made the parts for the transmitters are no longer in business because no one else in the world uses these parts.

We are woefully behind Radio Moscow in the number of hours broadcast and the number of broadcast languages. And we aren't even in second place behind Radio Moscow; we trail behind many other nations in the comparative hours we broadcast worldwide. We rank fifth among other nations in hours broadcast to Africa, fifth in hours broadcast to Latin America and the Caribbean, sixth in hours broadcast to Eastern Europe, and sixth in hours broadcast to East Asia.

I am quoting, if I may, from Secretary Shultz, and he says:

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: As the time for House consideration of the State Authorization bill, H.R. 2068, approaches, I would like to share with you my thoughts on the activities and needs of the Department of State, the Foreign Service and all the other official Americans abroad which this Department services and protects. Sincerely yours,

GEORGE P. SHULTZ.

I might indicate that this legislation contains a little over $400 million for embassy security.

Mr. Chairman, Secretary Shultz said that H.R. 2068 represents the absolute bottom line and that he didn't want the events of the previous 2 years repeated. I know that every Member of this House shares that feeling. We have a very real obligation to our people serving in Foreign Service posts to provide them with the best possible protection, in many of those posts just a minimum amount of security may mean the difference between business as usual and disaster, but in other posts no amount of security can guarantee that a tragedy will not occur. Nevertheless, as Members of the House of Representatives we would be remiss in our duties not to see that the necessary funding is provided. H.R. 2068 provides those funds.

If you support this bill, you will be able to go home to your districts confident that you have done all you can to support the safety of our foreign service personnel.

The bill contains very few initiatives, actually no new initiatives. It is a continuation of last year's authority. Any increases are basically for security, protection of our foreign service people and facilities abroad, and the modernization effort that I mentioned earlier; the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, and Radio Liberty.

I like to think of this bill as one that funds our peaceful resolutions to conflict situations. It is only when our diplomatic efforts fail abroad, when we lose the battle for the hearts and minds of men and women around the world, that we can be drawn into armed confrontation. In its current form it is almost a freeze level, it is currently $31,600,000 under the executive branch request, and I might say that long before we came to the floor and the other events preceding this, we moved to cut that amount.

As reported by the House Foreign Affairs Committee, it is only a few million dollars over the actual 1985 funding level. And I might point out at this time that the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE] and the chairman will offer an absolute freeze amendment at the appropriate time in this legislation so that we will end this legislation and vote on a bill with a total freeze.

Mr. Chairman, I would urge support of H.R. 2068. It represents our efforts to support our diplomats and our missions overseas and the commitment by this Congress to continue the radio modernization that we started 2 years ago and which was at least 20 years overdue.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICA. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DICKINSON. I am not sure that this is the appropriate time to bring this question up, but I have inquired and I am told that this bill does have to do with the housing, both Embassy and personnel in foreign countries and security matters, and so forth; am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. MICA. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me voice a concern that I have and see if the gentleman can help me at least build a record here.

As a member of the House Armed Services Committee, I necessarily have to travel in foreign countries, and it has been my experience in the past that there has been a very woeful lack of reciprocity between the United States and the countries with which we have diplomatic dealings and embassies, et cetera.

For instance, there have been some countries that we visited, Malaysia, for instance, where we were told we were not even allowed to own, the United States could not purchase and own property, that we had to rent property and pay 5 years rent in advance in order for us to put an AID mission to bring assistance to them, and we were not allowed to own property. Recently, in the last couple of years, I was in Mexico, for instance, and I was a house guest of our Ambassador Gavin. I have since heard from him as to the lack of reciprocity between Mexico and the United States in their limitation of the number of vehicles that our Embassy can own in that country or import into that country. We are talking about the limitation of numbers of personnel, the freedom to travel within a country. and there has been such a woeful lack of reciprocity between this country and other countries when they can come here and buy what they want, have as many employees as they want, they can travel as they please, they can own the number of vehicles they want, but we do not have the same rights and privileges in their country as we do in this country.

I was wondering if the gentleman, first, would agree that what I am saying is so; and, second, if he could inform us what, if anything, we are doing to try to remedy this imbalance of treatment between foreign countries and this country.

First, am I exaggerating the situation? Does it in fact exist?

Mr. MICA. Let me make this comment first, and then I will respond to the gentleman's concern: I would apologize to the ranking minority member for entering into the colloquy before the gentlewoman's opening statement, and we will try to keep this very brief and allow the opening statement, and we may be able to pick up on this colloquy after the opening statement.

Mr. DICKINSON. All right.

Mr. MICA. But let me just say, briefly: Absolutely, the chairman has concern and the committee has concern over the issues just mentioned. We intend to have some hearings and look into this and hold a closed briefing. We have raised the issue with the State Department.

I would say that in some cases our interest in being there overrides the problems we are having with the government because it is more beneficial to us, and in other instances we may have to take some tough actions that show that reciprocity would be demanded.

But if I may yield to the gentleman from Florida, we have discussed this matter with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HUTTO].

Mr. HUTTO. I appreciate my colleague from Florida for yielding. The gentleman from Alabama has raised a very important issue. I do have a bill on the subject, House Joint Resolution 241, but it deals mainly with the reciprocity issue between the Soviet Union and the United States. As my colleague and all of you know, the Soviets have a great many more people in this country than we have there. As a matter of fact, I believe about 570 over here, and we have only 320 there. The CIA and the FBI have identified, I guess, at least half of them as being KGB agents.

So I do believe that there should be some reciprocity not only in the numbers of people but also in the status, the privileges that we allow them over here and we do not get there, immunities, accommodations, as the gentleman mentioned, travel facilities, and many other imbalances that we have between the Soviet Union and the United States. I am sure that this is not the only country. The gentleman has already alluded to Mexico and others. I was tempted to offer an amendment, but after talking to the gentleman from Florida and learning that he will hold hearings on this, I appreciate the fact that he is interested in it and will try to do something about what I think is a very serious problem that should have attention.

Mr. MICA. If I may reclaim my time, I will add that this will be a subject of oversight hearings. We felt it was appropriate under the Foreign Mission Act, which will be dealt with by the committee. There is serious concern.

I would simply add that we felt very strongly that to try to deal with it with a floor amendment, and we were attempting to do that, on the State Department authorization bill, with a subject that we understood we may need classified briefings on, was inappropriate. So I would assure each of the gentlemen that we will be holding hearings on it, and we will also be happy to notify them of the hearings and those classified briefings. The concerns expressed by each of the gentlemen here today are concerns of the committee and the chairman.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MICA. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DICKINSON. I can appreciate the subject matter and the concern of my good friend and colleague and neighbor to the south from Florida, dealing with the Soviet Union, which is just a part of the problem. My concern, really, is with the total problem, because it is not just whether they are Communists or non-Communist nations. I am talking about the treatment that the United States is accorded worldwide and has traditionally been the case, and I am pleased that we are, after lo these many years, getting concerned enough to have hearings, and I certainly would like to participate.

For instance, I just recently had a constituent in the Dominican Republic who entered into a contract with the government and which was signed by 12 of the officials of the government and had the seal on it. We are considering a $120 million grant to the Dominican Republic, and they vitiate a contract and will not give a reason, just say that they changed their minds. And so our dealings with foreign governments in the past have certainly not been evenhanded, as far as reciprocal respect and support for us, what we can and cannot do, and I would commend the gentleman for having the hearings that he has scheduled. I think it is much broader than just the Soviet Union. I think any small country that wants to in the past has kicked us in the shin with impunity, and we just kept giving them money and saying we do not want to make them mad, we do not want to lose a friend, when, in fact, we do not have their respect. I would rather have their respect than their friendship any time.

So let me thank the gentleman for yielding. I look forward to participating in his future hearings.

Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICA. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HUTTO. I certainly do not disagree with the gentleman from Alabama that it is a broader problem than just the United States and the Soviet Union. But I do think that this is a most critical issue because, as you know, we lose a lot of our technology to the Soviet Union, the Warsaw Pact nations, we put over $20 billion a year in military technology, and the Soviets oftentimes get a free ride.

I guess my question to the gentleman would be, would it be a different type of problem in dealing with our allies than it would in the Soviet Union? Does the gentleman think he will be able to mandate certain restrictions or certain privileges with a broad brush, or would you have to treat the countries a little different? I guess this would be the subject of hearings.

Mr. MICA. If I may reclaim my time, it would be my judgment that the committee could make selective reciprocity recommendations or changes in law. That would, obviously, be the judgment of the committee. But I would say to both gentlemen, each have raised what I consider a legitimate concern; both should be dealt with.

I would add that those are concerns that other Members have expressed, and I invite other Members: If you know of an instance like the one that was just mentioned on the floor, we would like to know about it. I, too, get mighty upset when I hear this kind of treatment to our individuals, our American businessmen, our American diplomats, and those of us who are trying to work around the world not receiving that type of reciprocity.

So we will look not only at the Soviet Union, but also at the other issues of our allies as we move into these hearings.

I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HUTTO. I appreciate the gentleman doing that.

Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that oftentimes nations, such as the Soviet Union, bring their own drivers, secretaries; they bring all that. Whereas we pump a little into the economy of these other nations by hiring from those nations which I think is a good thing.

I appreciate the gentleman yielding, and appreciate the fact that he is very interested in this problem of reciprocity, and I look forward to your hearings on that.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2068, legislation authorizing appropriations for the Department of State, the U.S. Information Agency [USIA], and the Board for International Broadcasting [BIB] for fiscal years 1986 and 1987.

As the ranking Republican member on the Subcommittee on International Operations, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my colleague, the gentleman from Florida, the chairman of our subcommittee. I believe the gentleman has provided a concise and effective overview of H.R. 2068 and I commend him for his hard work on this legislation.

I particularly want to commend the subcommittee chairman for admirable bipartisan spirit which he demonstrated during the several days of hearings held on the many complex aspects of operations and policies that this legislation addresses. I have truly enjoyed working with the gentleman from Florida and the other members and the staff of the subcommittee and the full committee as well.

I also want to thank the gentleman from Florida, the chairman of the full committee, for this kind words and also his willingness to work with us on these important issues as well.

Going through the bill on an agency-by-agency basis, I think that we have taken a rational and balanced approach toward the President's budget requests. The subcommittee, as agreed to by the full committee, recommends a funding level over $31 million less than the administration's request. However, the chairman and I plan to further reduce this funding level by introducing two amendments which will have the effect of freezing the funding for the Department of State, the U.S. Information Agency, and the Board of International Broadcasting at the fiscal year 1985 estimated appropriations levels.

At the appropriate time during the debate, Chairman MICA and I plan to introduce an amendment to title II of the bill which would result in the postponement of some of the Voice of America's modernization program and would reduce the authorization of the National Endowment of Democracy from $31.3 million to $19.3 million; and second, cut $15,353 million from the Voice of America's modernization program, causing merely a postponement of some of these programs.

After a comprehensive and bipartisan review by the members and staff of the subcommittee, it is clear to me that, in today's difficult budgetary climate, there is clear justification for some changes in emphasis or timing of some programs. The subcommittee has responded to this principle, and our amendment would allow for reductions in certain programs which would result in some program delays.

One of the most important elements of the State Department's budget is funding for an expansion of measures to improve the security of our embassies and consulates overseas. The tragic events of the past 2 years have impressed upon all of us the need for improvement in embassy security programs, not only at our Foreign Service posts, but in the State Department as well.

Our subcommittee held several hearings on the various aspects of embassy security programs. While we determined that the State Department has made progress with regard to complex organizational problems in Washington and abroad, we feel that much more can be done to solve these problems and improve security overseas.

We have acted favorably on the executive branch request for increased funds to meet these needs. We are pleased that the State Department has already responded to some of the recommendations the committee has made to enhance security measures for our embassies abroad, and we look forward to further progress in this regard.

In addition to the administration's request for security funds, we have added $7.5 million to continue critical foreign national security guard services for U.S. diplomatic missions abroad, since the security supplemental did not provide sufficient funds to continue their essential services during fiscal years 1986 and 1987. The foreign national guards perform vital services assisting our U.S. Marine guards by controlling perimeter access to our missions and related jobs.

The subcommittee slightly increased the State Department's recommended levels for the Asia Foundation to $10 million, which is the Foundation's current funding level, and added approximately $14.1 million for other purposes, including refugee resettlement in Israel and African relief. We are also recommending a decrease in the Department's international organization and conference account in order to fund the relief and resettlement activities I just mentioned.

In order to reassert a more appropriate measure of congressional involvement in important aspects of foreign affairs, we recommended the passage of a new section 104 to repeal the permanent authorization for U.S. payments to the United Nations for expenses of the U.N. peacekeeping force in the Middle East. This move would require the Secretary of State to come to the Congress for both authorization and appropriation of such funds.

I also agree with the gentleman from Florida and other members of the subcommittee that the administration has not consulted adequately with Congress with regard to alternative means of assuring that nongovernmental U.S. bodies would continue to participate in useful Unesco activities. In an effort to at least assure that we maintain a modicum of contact between the U.S. Government and private sectors and Unesco, we have recommended a new section 105 to earmark $250,000 from the State Department's administration of foreign affairs account to fund the U.S. National Commission on Unesco. This section meshes well with the administration's policy of encouraging greater private sector participation in U.N. activities.

I have been pleased to participate in the development of a number of amendments to this legislation in the narcotics field, especially section 124, which would instruct those U.S. Government agencies involved in controlling the serious drug problem in this country, particularly the State Department and the Drug Enforcement Administration, to cooperate with each other to prevent drug traffickers from traveling to this country, rather than perpetuate the rivalries that have stymied such efforts in recent years.

With regard to USIA, I support the decreases recommended in this bill, a savings of $24 million in fiscal year 1986 alone. While I support the continuing modernization of the Voice of America, I agree that some of the future modernization stages can be delayed without jeopardizing them.

I also feel strongly that the funds requested by the executive branch for an expansion of the Worldnet TV Program would be better spent at this time to expand the Agency's programs to translate and publish more American books for distribution abroad. The book programs have been very effective, and the additional funds will allow us to reach more individuals in many developing countries.

The Board for International Broadcasting operates extremely useful programs through Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. Although the levels of funding for 1986 and 1987 are $19.8 million and $3.3 million less than the administration's request, I do not think the proposed cuts—a deferral in the radios' modernization program—will have any negative effect. The fact that the funds would probably not be obligated until a later phase in the modernization program argues for a more balanced authorization level over the 3-year period of the enhancement program.

In addition, the subcommittee has reviewed programing by the two radios and concluded that certain recent events point to a need for an improved preprograming review. I support efforts by members of our subcommittee to assure better review of scripts before their actual broadcast on RFE or RL.

We have, therefore, added a new section 304 expressing the sense of Congress that the Board for International Broadcasting and Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, Inc., take action to strengthen oversight and management of the two radios. This is especially important with regard to daily oversight and prebroadcast and postbroadcast review of program content and quality.

Before I conclude my remarks, I wish to indicate my support for the National Endowment for Democracy [NED], including its National Republican and Democratic Institutes for International Affairs. The subcommittee held hearings on the Endowment, and I have studied its programs in some detail. As a result of this experience, I am pleased with its goals and objectives during its first year of operation. Although, I was not originally enthusiastic about the concept of the NED or its institutes, and voted against authorizing or appropriating funds for it in the past, I have decided that NED has responded positively to a number of suggestions from Members of Congress to remove any misgivings about various aspects of its programs.

Having questioned NED officials and reviewed some of the projects funded by the NED directly or through its institutes I was impressed by many of these projects and the results they were able to achieve. Given the constraints under which USIA and other U.S. Government agencies must of necessity operate their programs, I think that some of the successful activities underwritten by the NED, and especially the National Republican and Democratic Institutes for International Affairs, have been well formulated and efficiently executed. Therefore, I strongly support the restoration of funding by the National Endowment for the Republican and Democratic Institutes, which—I might add—are not directly associated with the national committees of the two major political parties.

The addition of a new section 505 to the National Endowment for Democracy Act, which we have included as section 205 of this legislation, in my view, answers comprehensively all the concerns that have been raised in the past about possible misuse of endowment funds:

Subsection 505(a) insures that NED's actions will be available to the public; that neither NED or its grantees can finance particular candidates in foreign elections; and that funds granted by NED to the Republican and Democratic Party institutes may not be used for domestic U.S. political purposes.

Subsection 505(b) requires the grantees to consult with U.S. Ambassadors to a foreign country before NED funds are made available by a grantee for a project in that country.

Subsection 505(c) states that NED funds granted to the two party institutes shall, to the maximum extent possible, be used for jointly implemented projects, in order to avoid the appearance of partisan politics.

With these legislative safeguards, I think that we have responded comprehensively to any objection raised thus far to continued support for this experiment in building and strengthening democracy overseas in countries where it is weakest.

I am hopeful that now we can proceed through the rest of the process which will result in a measure which will allow the State Department, the U.S. Information Agency [USIA] and the Board for International Broadcasting [BIB] to plan for the next 2 years. I believe the bill is a good bill which reflects, to the greatest extent possible, both the administration's interests and Members' concerns.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the entire House to support the budget for the State Department, USIA and its programs, and the Board for International Broadcasting.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

I would just like to comment on the gentlewoman's remarks and compliment her for the comments on the National Endowment for Democracy. I think this body might note that a year ago we had major controversy over that issue and this committee, in a bipartisan fashion, took down every major issue that was expressed by Members on both sides of the aisle and we have addressed every one of those issues in this legislation and, again, it was done on a unanimous vote, so I commend the gentlewoman.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICA. I would be happy to yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman is correct. I think that we examined every concern and position in view of Members who were involved in this program in the past and had some concerns, and we had some very thorough and exhaustive hearings on the National Endowment and attempted to address those issues in this legislation with a number of changes that we have made to insure that the program will develop in the way it was originally intended.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the bipartisan spirit in which this bill has been proposed by the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA], and of course the chairman of the full committee [Mr. FASCELL].

This is an important, positive bill that makes very strong and positive statements, whether it is in shoring up our security in our embassies abroad, whether it is centralizing communications within the State Department to deal more effectively with international narcotics programs, whether it is insuring that the National Endowment for Democracy works effectively.

I, too, was once against this endowment, but after seeing it operate after a trip to Latin America, I think it is most effective.

Last, it is a bill that improves the communications policy of the Department.

I would also like to thank the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] for his interest and willingness in several amendments that I was going to offer to this State Department authorization bill, which I will not be offering. I will be offering them later to another bill so as not to jeopardize the importance of this legislation.

These are three amendments, one of which would express concern and condemnation of the Government of Cuba for their human rights violations, another dealing with the Nicaraguan situation, the concern over the trip of Mr. Ortega's to the Soviet Union, and some of the United States' responses, and lastly, an amendment that I would offer to a South Africa bill that would deal with prohibiting the importation of coal and uranium from South Africa.

Mr. Chairman, I fully support this bill. It is an important piece of legislation and much credit should go to my colleague, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA], and the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], and of course the chairman of the full committee [Mr. FASCELL].

Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my concern and disapproval over the apartheid policies of the South African Government and to urge my colleagues to support my efforts to prohibit the importation of uranium and coal from South Africa and Namibia, a country which is controlled by South Africa. Mr. Chairman, I would also like to thank my distinguished colleague, Chairman FASCELL and Congressmen YATRON and MICA for all of his work in the area of human rights and for the support he has given me in this regard.

Mr. Chairman, we all deplore the terrible system of apartheid practiced by the Republic of South Africa. Under that system, black citizens not only are disenfranchised, not only are confined to slums to live, not only are afforded inferior educational opportunities, but also are compelled to work at lower paying jobs and are given little or no change for meaningful advancement.

The South African policy of inequality is not simply harmful to the citizens of South Africa; it also takes a direct and unacceptable toll on Americans. The apartheid system permits South Africa to produce minerals such as uranium and coal, and to exploit deposits of these minerals, largely through the toil of South Africa's black population. Uranium is mined by virtual slave labor under brutal and unsafe conditions, sold by a South African Government agency—NUFCOR—transported in secrecy to foreign countries, marked with false labels and shipping orders, owned by a tangle of multinational corporations whose activities are only partially disclosed and sold to the United States at the expense of the American uranium miner. South Africa's prior history in the 1970's of participating in an international cartel to restrict production and to raise prices has exacerbated the grave condition of the U.S. domestic uranium market today.

As a direct result of South Africa's apartheid system, its subsidies and other policies, about one-third of U.S. imports of uranium now involve material of South African origin. From employment of 20,000 workers 5 years ago, the American uranium industry now employs only 2,000 workers and only a handful of mines remains open. South Africa is also the largest importer of coal into the United States—in 1984 we imported 612,447 tons of coal from South Africa. The United States is rich in coal—I find it unconscionable that we would allow the importation of coal mined in a country whose human rights abuses are known to all, at the expense of the American miner.

We in the U.S. Congress now have an opportunity to right two serious wrongs—to send a clear message to the South African Government that we will not condone their deplorable policies of apartheid and to say to the American miner, we are willing to restrict these imports to save their jobs.

Mr. Chairman, apartheid is a moral outrage and is having a direct and grossly detrimental impact on American workers. My efforts, which I ask my colleagues to support, will contribute to correcting this deplorable situation.

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 2068 OFFERED BY MR. RICHARDSON OF NEW MEXICO, APRIL 29, 1985

TITLE IV—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 401. FINDINGS AND POLICIES CONCERNING NICARAGUA AND PEACE IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(a) UNITED STATES SUPPORT FOR PEACE IN CENTRAL AMERICA.—The Congress finds and declares the following:

(1) The United States desires peace in Nicaragua and throughout Central America. United States policy toward Nicaragua should encourage all combatants to establish a ceasefire and come together in peace negotiations in order to resolve the internal Nicaraguan conflict, nurture democratic institutions in that country, and promote peace and stability, as part of a regional settlement through the Contadora process or the Organization of American States.

(2) The countries of Central America, working through the Contadora process, have agreed to 21 principles (set forth in the Contadora Document of Objectives issued on September 9, 1983) which provide an appropriate framework for achieving peace and security in the region.

(3) Combatants on both sides of the conflict in Nicaragua have expressed in words their goals for peace and democracy in Nicaragua and throughout the region. United States policy should be designed to encourage these goals, including through the resumption of bilateral talks between the United States and Nicaragua.

(b) UNITED STATES CONCERNS ABOUT NICARAGUAN FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC POLICIES.—The Congress further finds and declares the following:

(1) Despite positive actions by the Congress signaling support for negotiated solutions to conflicts in Central America, there are disturbing trends in Nicaragua's foreign and domestic policies, including—

(A) President Daniel Ortega's April 1985 trip to the Soviet Union at a time when the Congress signaled its strong disapproval of increasing Nicaraguan-Soviet ties;

(B) the Sandinista government's close military ties with Cuba, the Soviet Union, and its Warsaw Pact allies; the disappointing and insufficient reduction of the number of Cuban advisors in Nicaragua by only 100 out of an approximately 2500; and the continuing military buildup that Nicaragua's neighbors consider threatening;

(C) the Sandinista government's curtailment of individual liberties, political expression, freedom of worship, and the independence of the media;

(D) the subordination of military, judicial, and internal security functions to the ruling political party; and

(E) the Sandinista government's efforts to export its influence and ideology;

(2) Should Nicaragua not address the concerns described in paragraph (1), the United States has several options to address this challenge to peace and stability in the region, including political, diplomatic, and trade sanctions. In addition, the United States—

(A) should through appropriate regional organizations, such as the Organization of American States, seek to maintain multilateral pressure on Nicaragua to address these concerns; and

(B) should, if called upon to do so, give serious consideration to supporting any sanctions adopted by such an organization.

(3) In assessing whether or not progress is being made in addressing these concerns, the Congress will expect prompt and significant initiatives by the Government of Nicaragua such as—

(A) the removal of foreign military advisers from Nicaragua;

(B) the end to Sandinista support for insurgencies in other countries in the region, including the cessation of military supplies to the rebel forces fighting the democratically elected government in El Salvador;

(C) restoration of individual liberties, political expression, freedom of worship, and the independence of the media; and

(D) progress toward internal reconciliation and a pluralitic democratic system, including steps to liberalize institutions in order to allow the internal opposition in Nicaragua to become a viable partner in the Nicaraguan political process.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON].

Mr. SOLOMON. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, as the ranking member on the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations, ladies and gentlemen, I have spent a great deal of time looking into our U.N. operations and our U.N. assessment.

First of all, let me just commend the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA], and the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE] for the outstanding job that they have done in bringing the bill to the floor, particularly that part that would deal with the protection of our embassies overseas and in helping our U.S. marines to protect our U.S. personnel in those embassies.

However, I do have some concern, and I will be offering an amendment at the appropriate time which would reduce our U.N. assessment by 15 percent for the next 2 years. I do so, Mr. Chairman, because I found out that the abuses that take place in the United Nations, in the perks that are given and the salaries that are paid to U.N. personnel are simply outrageous.

Seventy-five percent of our U.N. assessment goes toward those salaries and benefits, and yet more than 200 officials in the United Nations, spread all over this world, make more money than the Vice President of the United States of America, tax free—tax free. Many of the professional staff in the United Nations make more money than the Cabinet officers in the present administration's Cabinet, more money annually than any Member of this Congress. That is more than $75,000 a year, tax free.

I could go on and on, but I think that the situation is this: that back in 1972 when GEORGE BUSH, as a matter of fact, was our U.N. Ambassador, we had renegotiated the amount of assessment that the United States would pay toward the United Nations. We reduced it at that time down to 25 percent, and since that period of time in 1972, the U.N. assessment, although it has stayed at 25 percent, the cost has risen because of these outrageous perquisites and salaries and benefits that are paid to U.N. personnel. It has more than tripled in just that period of time.

Somewhere along the way we have to send a message that we just will not continue this.

Mr. Chairman, at this point in debate, I think it would be useful to examine the very valid question of how this amendment could affect our standing at the United Nations. Article 19 of the U.N. Charter states that any country shall lose its vote in the General Assembly if that country is in arrears in its financial obligations to the United Nations for more than 2 years. The amount of money in arrears is defined as the sum equal to or greater than the country's assessed contributions for the 2 years in question.

To get straight to the point, Mr. Chairman: The argument that this amendment could jeopardize our voting rights in the General Assembly is just not true. Let me list the reasons why:

First, the amount of our assessed contribution to the United Nations is negotiated, it is not mandated. Now it is true that all member countries are required to make a contribution to the United Nations, but the amount of those contributions is determined by negotiations, not mandates. In this connection, I also refer to testimony by Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick before the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations on October 3, 1983. She told the subcommittee that "our obligation is real, substantial, and serious, but * * * it is not absolute."

Second, I would call your attention to a policy declaration known as the Goldberg reservation. This was a document prepared in 1965 by Arthur Goldberg, a distinguished American from my home State of New York, who was our Ambassador to the United Nations at the time. The Goldberg reservation declares the right of the United States to withhold funds from the United Nations when the purposes for which those funds will be used are inconsistent with the foreign policy objectives of the United States.

Third, and finally, we must look at what has been the actual practice of the United Nations with respect to member countries that have withheld funds in the past. The simple fact is that no country has ever lost its vote in the General Assembly because of funds having been withheld.

Over the years at least 30 countries have withheld funds from the United Nations. The list includes most of the countries in the Soviet bloc as well as a number of others, including France, Portugal, Algeria, India, and even Saudi Arabia. In the case of the Soviet bloc, the Soviet Union and its satellites have systematically withheld at least $260 million in assessments for U.N. peacekeeping operations. As long as 1982 the International Court of Justice ruled that the specific withholding of obligations for U.N. peacekeeping operations was in clear contravention of the U.N. Charter. But, the question is: Have any of these countries lost their voting rights? The answer is "No."

Let me reiterate: My amendment does not reduce the United States obligation to U.N. peacekeeping operations. My amendment does reduce by 15 percent for a period of 2 years the size of our assessed contribution to the U.N. budget. Even if this amendment is enacted, the United States will still be the largest single donor to the United Nations by far.

Let me just say in conclusion that I have not introduced this amendment lightly or frivolously. The simple fact is that our own budgetary stringencies compel us to take a hard look at how we are spending our money. And I believe any objective study of management and personnel practices at the United Nations must lead to the conclusion that we cannot continue throwing good money after bad. As the largest donor, indeed the host, of the United Nations, we owe it to ourselves to find out where the money is going. And in the long run, by addressing the serious problems in the United Nations now, we are assuring the viability of that institution in the future.

This amendment is moderate in scope. It will not jeopardize in any way our participation in the United Nations. But it does make the symbolic point that the United States attaches greater importance to the principles on which the United Nations was founded than to preserving a swollen, self-perpetuating monstrosity.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2068, the State Department authorization bill, and urge my colleagues to support this bill when it comes to the floor for the amendatory process. I urge the Members to try to preserve it as much as possible in its committee form and then support it on final passage.

Let me just say that there is a large number of very important programs contained in the bill, in addition to the 2-year State Department authorization, which certainly in itself is a most important part of our Government process, and, of course, for our foreign policy, absolutely necessary. In it is the State Department authorization for the coming 2 years, and involved in that are some things that are very, very important and necessary for the State Department to continue the important work that it does.

Other speakers have already alluded to the fact that for the first time in history we are having to make a major concerted effort to protect our embassies and personnel around the world from terrorist attacks. This bill, in conjunction with the work that was done by our subcommittee and the full committee, under the leadership of my two colleagues, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], is continuing this process of reprogramming money for the purpose of upgrading and securing our embassies in various places where terrorism has in fact reared its ugly head.

In addition to that, we are involved very much in upgrading our capability to detect and catch, through the use of cooperation between the DEA and the State Department and others involved, narcotics traffickers who are now involved in terrorism. We have found a very ugly pattern of narco-terrorism where terrorists are using narcotics trafficking to raise money and using narcotics trafficking to secure the kinds of dollars they need to in fact continue their terrorist activities and support them around the world. At the same time we find narcotics traffickers using terrorists as, frankly, bodyguards and people who are guarding their narcotics trafficking, and this is the kind of thing that is a symbiotic relationship for them that in turn becomes a parasitic relationship for us and a very dangerous trend for the United States and for its personnel. And I might add, as everyone will agree, that we want to have the best-trained and the most dedicated, loyal cadre of foreign service officers of any country. We are not going to get that when men and women fear for their own safety and the safety of their families and their children when they are sent to posts overseas. This is a very important part of the bill.

Second, the Board for International Broadcasting and Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe for radio service in Europe perform a very important function. I was very, very pleased, at the chairman's request, to go to Munich for 2 days this year to do an overview of the kind of necessary changes that we feel are appropriate for the BIB and for the two radio services.

We have a very strong piece of foreign policy in those radios. We have a very effective voice for freedom, for democracy, for justice, and for human rights in those radios. There have been some problems. There have been some reports and, frankly, some realistic appearances of programs broadcast on the radios being inappropriate. There has been anti-Semitism, not intended, but when the audience heard the programs, they were necessarily deduced to be anti-Semitic. We have in fact, through the efforts of the whole committee, both Republicans and Democrats, on a bipartisan basis, been able to, I think, plug up the problems, and we have had very much the cooperation of the radios in that regard.

There is right now in the bill very important work, including authorization for additional moneys for them to be able to upgrade the capability and capacity of those radios to do an even better job, to make them an even more credible voice for foreign policy, for justice, for democracy, and for human rights. I hope that some of my colleagues who have reservations about those radios will support the bill for this reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH] has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] yield me 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] has only 1 minute remaining.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 additional seconds to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I want to express my support of the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE] in her request that our colleagues support in full the National Endowment for Democracy. That is probably one of the single best programs we can have for voicing and showing to the rest of the world our democratic ideology.

Finally, I want to urge all my colleagues to support this bill the way it has been supported by all the members of the subcommittee. I want to pay special tribute to the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA], and the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], the ranking Republican. If this bill gets the support on the floor that it deserves, the support that it got on both sides in our subcommittee, this bill will pass, and it will be a good bill.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER].

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, a year ago, I spoke on the floor concering the involvement of U.S. cooperatives in programs of the National Endowment for Democracy. I mentioned that cooperatives—which are governed by one member, one vote—were a natural vehicle for offering people in other countires an opportunity to participate in democratic decisionmaking at the grassroots.

Today, I am pleased to report that the National Endowment for Democracy has embraced the promotion of democratic cooperatives as part of its overseas programs. One of the first projects of NED involves an effort by U.S. cooperatives to help sustain democratic cooperatives in Chile. I can think of no more vital program than to provide this type of support to democratic organizations in a country such as Chile. The project in no way involves support for the current military government of Chile. I will later submit for the RECORD a summary of findings by U.S. cooperative leaders who recently visited Chile.

Second, this Member wishes to join many of my colleagues, expressing serious concerns about the manner in which the U.S. Government is approaching the question relative to the nature of and the terms of support for international telecommunications satellite systems separate from Intelsat. I know firsthand that many foreign governments that are among America's foremost friends in the world are completely puzzled and very troubled by what they perceive as a proposal that will inevitably be harmful to Intelsat. To date, the actions of the State Department on this issue have not put to rest these fears among our allies in the Intelsat community. Additionally, this Member also has great concerns that there will be inadequate attention to putting teeth into the administration's prepared criteria for assuring that Intelsat is not injured by support for new satellite systems. With the Communications Satellite Act of 1962 Congress took the initiative that established the Intelsat global system, Congress should play a significant role in determining how and whether we are going to revise our commitments to that valuable enterprise.

REPORT BY U.S. COOPERATIVE LEADERS ON THE PROGRAMS OF THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR DEMOCRACY TO ENCOURAGING DEMOCRATIC COOPERATIVES IN CHILE

Cooperatives in Chile are functioning well as grassroots, democratic self-help organizations committed to assisting low- and moderate-income people. They are important forces for economic and political democracy. Adversely affected by Chilean politics and economics, they have suffered for 15 years under the current and previous administrations. As a result, many cooperatives failed. But the situation has stabilized and cooperatives are growing again.

Cooperatives are member-owned businesses governed through one person, one vote. In Chile today, they are often the most direct experience of low- and moderate-income people with democratic practice. Cooperative elections are honest. Divergent viewpoints on issues important to members are openly expressed, debated and voted. Leadership is developed through elections to voluntary boards of directors. Annual meetings are often well attended and support from members is demonstrated through the use of cooperative services such as credit, agricultural supplies and marketing, electricity and housing.

Chilean cooperatives contain a variety of political viewpoints from support of the current government to active opposition. They have extraordinary access to democratic elements in society and are advocates of a return to democratic life in Chile.

While the study team was in Chile, there was a national strike, resignation of the entire cabinet and declaration of a state of siege. Violence from terrorists of the extreme left and right, and from government security forces, is on the rise. Yet the study team believes that a national movement for democracy has clearly emerged. It is strongly rooted and has momentum.

The key issue is the type of democracy: either an "authoritarian" and highly controlled model supported by the military government, or a more open political system with an early timetable for elections. The study team believes that the majority of Chileans support an early return to true democracy but also fear destabilization of society from forces of the extreme right and left.

The United States Government needs to understand the full dimensions of this difference between various visions of democracy. U.S. policies and programs should be initiated to support those democratic voices in Chile which are seeking a peaceful transition to civilian rule.

The newly created National Endowment for Democracy can make a constructive contribution in supporting and strengthening democratic institutions in Chile through non-governmental approaches. The study team recommends a major focus of the National Endowment on support for political parties, the press, labor unions, private businesses and cooperatives in their efforts to bring about democracy in Chile. Such programs need to be long term and sustained.

In regards to cooperatives, the study team recommends support for a follow-on program to undertake a comprehensive review of the legal and administrative obstacles to cooperative development in Chile. This effort should be geared to improving the image of cooperatives as important free enterprise institutions. It should enhance the capacity of cooperatives to influence government policies, and generate a better understanding by government officials of the special contributions cooperatives can make to economic and political life.

The study team also recommends creation of a cooperative center for the advancement of self-help cooperatives and similar democratic organizations for assisting low income people. Given the recent difficulties of cooperatives, universities and other supportive organizations need to be re-engaged in cooperative development in a comprehensive, systematic and grassroots way. An intellectual and resource center is needed for combining the practical business operations of cooperatives with a commitment to helping the poor.

The universities of Chile, which once played a significant role in cooperative education and training, should be encouraged to review and expand such programs. Nonprofit Chilean organizations and foundations need to be encouraged to pool their resources in support of cooperatives and other democratic private institutions. Outside donor agencies should assist these organizations as well as continue and expend support directly to cooperative organizations and federations. U.S. cooperatives will seek ways to support these cooperative educational efforts in Chile.

U.S. cooperatives are renewing their historic relationship with Chilean cooperatives. As part of this effort, U.S. cooperatives are sponsoring a 15-person Chilean cooperative delegation to the U.S. in April 1985. The delegation will observe the role of cooperatives in U.S. economic and political life. The exchange will lead to the creation of cooperative-to-cooperative relationships for technical exchange, trade and interaction.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time, and I, too, appreciate the hard work of the members of the committee that has gone into this bill.

As I had pointed out when we debated the rule for this bill, I do intend to offer an amendment at the appropriate time that would deal with the responsibility of the U.S. missions to permit freedom of the press overseas. The chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA], had indicated to me at that time that he felt certain that they would be able to accept that amendment.

I did want to put it in some kind of context, however, because this amendment does come as a section of a bill that was introduced earlier by several of us. It deals with human rights concerns around the world. We had introduced a bill that covers many, many aspects of human rights as it impacts on countries throughout the world.

One of the things that we were concerned about in that human rights legislation was the fact that free press access is a basic human right that is denied in all too many areas. It has a particular problem connected with it for democratic nations because what we have happening in a lot of tyrannical regimes across the world is the fact that they are engaged in disinformation campaigns as those nations relate to democratic nations.

In other words, what is happening is that they are actually promoting information which is intended to mislead democratic nations. One way of curing that situation is to assure that there is free press access in those countries, or at least assuring that our embassies abroad are trying to promote free press access in those countries, that this is a part of the agenda of what our people do in those nations to assure that democratic countries around the world and particularly this democratic country has as much access to information as possible, true information.

I will offer that amendment at the appropriate time.

Again, I appreciate the gentlewoman from Maine yielding me this time for a bit of an explanation.

● Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, last week the President addressed the American people. He called for an outpouring of citizen pressure on their elected Representatives in support of a single plan for reducing the budget deficit. Today, again, we have an opportunity to begin the hard task of deficit reduction by voting to reduce the State Department authorization to a level below the President's own request.

One of the most frequent ideas I have heard from citizens of Arkansas' Second District is to freeze spending in all areas. People faced with the prospect of insufficient resources in their household budgets, instinctively know that an immediate freeze on expenditure levels is the most prudent course. Today, we have a chance to employ the simple wisdom of home economics and vote to reduce the rate of growth in Federal spending. I realize inflation means that a freeze will mean reduced spending in constant dollars. In essence we are asking for Government to provide continued service levels with less funding. If apportioned fairly over the whole budget, the American people will support this course.

The Foreign Affairs Committee has done an excellent job in a difficult area. The committee bill calls for spending less money than requested by the administration. The mix of military to economic assistance has been improved by reducing the overreliance on military assistance. We may disagree over some of the individual funding levels but we should support the bill's contribution to reducing the budget deficit.●

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2068, the Department of State Authorization Act for fiscal years 1986 and 1987. As chairman of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, I particularly want to express my strong support for four provisions of the bill that will help to strengthen our international narcotics control efforts. In doing so, I commend Chairman FASCELL and the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee for incorporating these provisions in the bill.

Section 123 requires the Secretary of State, no later than 90 days after the date of enactment of the bill, to report to Congress on the status of proposals to improve staffing and personnel management in the Bureau of International Narcotics Matters. Mr. Chairman, despite the fact that illicit narcotics production around the world continues to increase, the State Department has failed to accord a top priority to international narcotics control policy. One reflection of the low priority narcotics control issues have received is the lack of attention that has been given to the staffing needs of our international narcotics control programs in the State Department. The Bureau of International Narcotics Matters has difficulty attracting the best candidates because too often narcotics assignments are viewed as not contributing to, or even worse detracting from, career development within the Foreign Service. The report mandated by section 123 will spell out appropriate alternatives to enhance staffing and personnel management on the Bureau of International Narcotics Matters which should, in turn, improve the management of our international narcotics control program.

Section 124 is designed to ensure that foreign drug traffickers do not receive a visa to enter the United States. It requires the State Department to cooperate with other U.S. law enforcement agencies, including the Drug Enforcement Administration [DEA] and Customs, to establish a comprehensive information system on all drug arrests of foreign nationals in the United States. The information collected would be available to U.S. consular officials so they could avoid approving visas of known drug traffickers. At present, there is no centralized system to keep track of foreign nationals who are arrested on drug charges in the United States. Section 124 also requires the State Department and DEA to establish uniform guidelines for the sharing of information on foreign drug traffickers. Both of these provisions should help to prevent the approval of visas for foreign drug traffickers who are ineligible to enter the United States under section 212(a)(23) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1182(a)(23)).

Section 125 mandates the Secretary of State to increase U.S. efforts to negotiate updated extradition treaties relating to drug offenses with each major drug-producing country, particularly those in Latin America. Under the terms of a 1982 treaty, the Government of Colombia recently extradited four suspected drug traffickers to the United States to face drug charges. One of these suspects was recently convicted in Federal District Court here in the District of Columbia. While much more needs to be done in source countries to eliminate illicit production, improve narcotics law and wipe out official corruption that impedes drug enforcement, the approval of updated extradition treaties will help to ensure that drug traffickers wanted in the United States who are apprehended in foreign countries will be brought to justice.

Finally, as a result of the brutal slaying of DEA agent Enrique Camarena Salazar as well as the disappearance of numerous other Americans in Mexico, section 126 finds that the violence by drug traffickers and other lawless elements in Mexico constitutes a danger to U.S. citizens traveling in Mexico. It directs the Secretary of State to issue a travel advisory to warn U.S. citizens of the danger of traveling in Mexico. This travel advisory is to remain in effect until those responsible for the murder of agent Camarena have been brought to trial and a verdict obtained.

After an initial lack of cooperation in the Camarena case, the Mexican Government has taken a number of steps to find the perpetrators of this terrible crime. Recently, a number of arrests have been made in connection with this case including Mexican police and a major Mexican drug trafficker. The threat of violence toward U.S. citizens in that country still remains, however. I believe section 126 is an appropriate way to maintain pressure on Mexico to prosecute those responsible for the murder of Enrique Camarena and to take aggressive measures to ensure the safety of U.S. citizens traveling in that country.

In sum, I strongly support these provisions of H.R. 2068 as important steps that will enhance our narcotics control efforts. Much more needs to be done, but these measures are steps in the right direction. I urge my colleagues to support these provisions.●

COMMENDING TASK FORCE CHAIRMAN PANETTA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this special order because I want to express my admiration for the work that was done regarding the contested election in the Eighth District of Indiana by the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

I very much regret that because I happened after a lot of thought to disagree with him intellectually on a very difficult decision that he had to make, that I was not able to vote in support of his recommendation; but I became even more regretful about that when I was forced to listen to a series of really quite unpleasant, inaccurate and ill-founded diatribes from some, not all by any means, but some Members on the other side.

I take the time of the House at this point because I simply feel compelled to disassociate myself, and I think many others on our side who did not vote with the task force recommendation, from the really extraordinarily ill-founded attacks that were made on the gentleman from California.

He was confronted with a very difficult situation not of his making. In the end I voted contrary to his recommendation because the votes that had been cast and counted in Indiana long before he arrived on the scene. He was confronted with a situation which was from his standpoint irremediable—that is easy for some people to say.

The issue he then had was how to deal with that defect. I think he dealt with it in a responsible, thoughtful, and nonpartisan manner.

In the end because I disagreed intellectually with that very tough decision he had to make, I was not able to vote with him, but I think it is important that some of us who did not vote with him make it clear that he remains in our minds a man of extraordinary integrity and of great ability and someone who conducted himself and conducted that proceeding in a manner that reflects a great deal of credit on the House.

Discredit in my judgemnt came from vituperation to which he was subjected, inaccurate descriptions of the procedure, totally unfounded imputations of motives, personal attacks, all of those he bore because he was being a responsible Member of the House discharging an unpleasant duty.

I wanted simply to make that as clear as I could.

I should add also that some of us who did vote on this side have thought for some time that was a good idea, and while I was pleased to have a lot of support on the other side of the aisle for the notion of a special election on Tuesday, I would have been even more pleased to have some of that manifested itself earlier in the preceding period. That is, among the inaccurate charges being made during this was that somehow there was partisanship on this side and not on the other.

In fact, the vote on this side of the aisle was not unanimous. There were a significant number of us who voted differently than the majority. It was on the other side that we had unanimity and it was a unanimity not in my judgment based wholly on dispassionate, intellectual analysis.

There was a great deal of partisanship in the House on both sides. There was an unwillingness by some people on both sides, I think, to look at this with the objectivity required.

In fact, I would ordinarily have spoken during the debate, but I felt that irresponsible and ill-founded charges on the other side had so poisoned the atmosphere that I simply could not justify particpating in the debate on that particular side. I voted as I felt compelled to vote, but I did so with a profound sense of admiration for the very responsible and throughtful way in which the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] discharged a very unpleasant job and I wanted to acknowledge that.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

U.S. POLICY IN NICARAGUA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUSTAMANTE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BUSTAMANTE. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to make some brief remarks about a subject that is important to me and many of my colleagues. Last week the House of Representatives made an important statement in rejecting any aid to Nicaragua. We told President Reagan that this country will not intervene in Nicaragua by use of covert CIA operations. We told the President that this country will not be known as a country that cannot deal directly with it neighbors.

The United States recognizes the Government of Nicaragua. We carry on diplomatic relations. More importantly, both countries carry on trade with each other. In 1984, the United States imported 69 million dollars' worth of goods from Nicaragua. These imports included fruit and vegetables; fish; and meat. In the same year, the United States exported 112 million dollars' worth of goods to Nicaragua. Given our deplomatic relations and favored trade policy, why can't the United Stated deal directly with Nicaragua? Would the United States treat our European neighbors in the same way?

Mr. Speaker, today we hear those who beat the drum tell us that this country should go to any extreme to ensure communism finds no place in the Western Hemisphere. These same voices tell the American people that some of us have our heads in the sand when it comes to facing up to communism. I am a Korean war veteran—my brother a decorated Vietnam veteran. Many of my colleages have seen war firsthand. Those who do not know the price of war would have the United States commit itself to the overthrow of the Government like Nicaragua's. This commitment may mean sending American citizens to fight. Should this unfortunate event occur it will not be the Congress that fights. Most of us are beyond the fighting age. Perhaps if some of us were still able to fight or had fought in previous wars our thinking would be different.

Such a war would once again be delegated to the poor, most of whom are poor whites, blacks, or Hispanics. How many of us would go or make such a decision?

During the Vietnam war, many young men from the district I represent gave their lives. Cities like San Antonio, Laredo, Del Rio, Crystal City, and Eagle Pass have proven their patriotism by the loss of their young men. The wall of names at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial contains the names of "Martinez," "Cervantes," and "Contreras." These surnames will appear once again as casualties in a war against Nicaragua.

Mr. Speaker, this country recognizes the Goverment of Nicaragua and at the same time would have it "cry uncle." Is it not better to deal with this government as an equal rather than as a "dumb little brother? I support true and meaningful dialog. Our message to Mr. Ortega should not be a threat nor should it be dialog with subterfuge, although it should be stern and honest. Let us work within the framework of international law. The Organization of American States need not be cast aside. The United Nations Charter and framework should not be used simply at our convenience. The Contadora process should be given a chance.

The 3.1 million people of Nicaragua have a right to self-determination. It should be a determination based on dialog not demands—a determination based on standards of international law, not on the ambitions of our country—a determination forged from compromise and not CIA intervention.

Let's make Nicaragua an example of how the United States can help a country achieve a pluralistic society, and not an example of how the United States will handle any Central American country that does not conform to our idea of government. Our interest in Nicaragua should not be based solely on communism versus democracy. Our interest must go beyond East-West ideologies. Otherwise, we encourage the loss of blood and the loss of respect and prestige for the United States.

The countries of Central America have the potential of becoming vital trade partners and political allies. Yet, we handle Central America piecemeal. U.S. policy has been a policy of reaction to individual countries. It is time for this administration and this Congress to devise a well-defined and workable plan for Central America. It is time for the American people to understand the cultures and histories of Central American countries. It is time to end our policy of confrontation.

We have an important ally to the south of us that watches closely our action toward Central America. The historical significance of U.S. intervention in Mexico during the early 20th century is not forgotten. Therefore, I ask my colleagues to think about the consequences of our action in Nicaragua and Central America. Our actions create a precedent. Do we continue down the narrow, winding road of reaction and confrontation? Or do we devise a plan toward Central America that will take us down the road of peace and respect?

SOLIDARITY SUNDAY FOR SOVIET JEWS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOAKLEY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, Sunday, May 5, marks the 14th annual commemoration of Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jews, a day in which people around the world express their support and admiration for those individuals involved in the continuing struggle for the right to emigrate from the Soviet Union, be it for themselves, for their families, or simply for a fellow Jew. Today, I join my colleagues in an attempt to focus attention on the plight of these individuals in the hope that with the consideration that attention will bring, also will come a change.

In the 2 years the Soviet Union has twice experienced a change in leadership; from Yuriy Andropov to Constantin Chernenko, and recently to Mikhail Gorbachev. I am certain that I was not alone in my hope that with each successive new leader would come a change in emigration policies, possibly a lessening of restrictions. However, with both Mr. Andropov and Mr. Chernenko, emigration statistics pertaining to Jews remained ominous, indeed dismal at best. In fact, under the influence of Mr. Chernenko, Jewish emigration ebbed to a low of 896 in 1984. Still, with the foreboding that this figure represents, Soviet Jews continue their efforts to obtain basic human rights and emigration privileges for those who have been castigated as refuseniks. This Sunday, let us each pause to remember these brave individuals in our thoughts and prayers, let us hope that they will soon be free, and let us continue with our efforts to realize these intentions.●

THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF THE MOTHER OF GOOD COUNSEL PROVINCE OF THE FELICIAN SISTERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call to the attention of my colleagues the 75th anniversary of the founding of the Mother of Good Counsel Province of the Felician Sisters.

This milestone in the history of the Felician Sisters was celebrated on April 21 with a simple banquet of soup, bread and fruit at the cafeteria of Good Counsel High School, and the money saved formed a fund of more than $17,000 which was donated to hungry people throughout the world.

The dinner was preceded by a eucharistic liturgy at Motherhouse Chapel at which His Eminence Joseph Cardinal Bernardin, archbishop of Chicago; Rev. James Kowalski, OFM, Conv., Felician provincial chaplain; and a number of former chaplains served as concelebrants.

The Felician Sisters continue to reflect their Polish heritage and traditions and still wear distinctive brown or beige habits. They were originally known as the "Congregation of the Sisters of St. Felix of Cantalice," and as the years passed, this was shortened to "Felicians."

As the Congressman for the 11th Illinois Congressional District, where Felician College is located, it gives me great pleasure to extend my congratulations to Sister Mary Bonita, president and dean of Felician College to Sister Mary Chrysantha, Director of Develolpment at Felician College; to Mother Mary Laudiose Korbal, provincial superior; and to the Felician Sisters on observing their 75th anniversary, and to wish for them many, many more years of productive, dedicated service to needy children, the sick, the elderly, and indeed to all those who have need of their devoted services.

A press release issued on the occasion of their 75th anniversary follows at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

CHICAGO PROVINCE OF THE FELICIANS CELEBRATES SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY YEAR

If you drive along busy Peterson Avenue in northwest Chicago you will come upon a part of the street west fo Pulaski where the familiar storefront urban scenery of the city is replaced by a large open space of trees and landscaped lawns.

Since traffic tends to speed up through here, you may have to look fast to notice among the trees a large institutional building dominated by a tall chapel spire. This is the house of the Mother of Good Counsel Province of the Felician Sisters—a unique community of Roman Catholic religious women who are observing the 75th anniversary of the founding of their four-state province.

The highlight of a quiet yearling observation came Sunday, April 21, in ceremonies typical of the spiritual and charitable character of the Felicians. They had a simple dinner of soup and breads baked by the sisters. The Mothers' Club of Good Counsel High School served the soup and the Ladies Auxiliary of the Province donated fruit. Money saved on the simple banquet, with additional contributions from individual sisters and convents, formed a fund of more than $17,000 which is being donated to hungry people of the world through various charitable organizations and missions.

The dinner was preceded by a Eucharistic liturgy in which Joseph Cardinal Bernardin, Archbishop of Chicago, Rev. James Kowalski, OFM, Conv., Felician provincial chaplain, and a number of former chaplains served as concelebrants. Vocal, organ and instrumental music was provided by sisters under the direction of Sister Mary Alphonsetta Haneman. In the Offertory Procession carrying the bread and wine to the alter were Sister Mary Pancratius Bunkowski, 94 years old, the first postulant admitted to the Mother of Good Counsel Province, and Sister Elaine Marie Killian, the most recent member.

There are more than 450 Felician Sisters in the province which administers the affairs of nearly 50 institutions and local houses in Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Alabama. The Felicians are the largest Catholic women's religious community in the Chicago area today. They teach in more of the parish schools in the Archdiocese than do those of any other order.

Sunday's anniversary events took place at the Motherhouse Chapel and the cafeteria of Good Counsel High School, which is owned and operated by the province on the Motherhouse grounds. Felician College is also located on the grounds.

The sisters' spiritual and administrative leader is Mother Mary Laudiose Korbal, provincial superior.

"In planning for the jubilee year," Mother Laudiose says, "we decided among ourselves to make the celebrations simple and spiritual, stressing introspection and prayer as we look back to our past and ahead to our future. This suggested our theme, 'Roots and Wings'—roots of the past and wings representing the challenges of change that lie ahead."

To symbolize the "roots and wings" themes at the solemn closing of the 75th anniversary celebration, the sisters prepared two banners. One, representing roots, carried the names of all sisters who have died since the province was founded. The other, representing wings, was signed by all living sisters of the province.

Concerning the "soup and bread" dinner celebration, Mother Laudiose explains: "We realized that a large public celebration with an elaborate banquet dinner could cost the province a great deal of money. Instead, we thought, why not use that money to benefit the hungry people in a world so full of need?"

The Mother of Good Counsel Province is one of seven Felician provinces in the United States. The congregation, founded in Poland in 1855, is also represented in other countries around the world including Poland, France, Canada, Brazil, and Kenya.

Felicians continue to reflect their Polish heritage and traditions, but today serve people of all faiths and national or ethnic origins. They are among the orders of Catholic women religious who continue to wear a distinctive habit. They are readily recognized by their brown or beige habits and the wooden hand-carved crucifix worn around the neck.

The foundress of the Felicians was a deeply religious and compasionate woman of Warsaw, Sophia Truszkowska, who was concerned about the plight of the many poor, hungry and uneducated children in that city during the mid 1800s. Other like-minded women joined her and the institute she formed became known as the Congregation of the Sisters of St. Felix of Cantalice, St. Felix is a patron saint of children. The first sisters were often seen praying before his statue and devotion to him increased. The people began to call them "Felicians"—the shortened name they still retain. Sophia became Mother Mary Angela and carried on as the spiritual leader of the growing congregation through years of suppression and hardship, as well as growth and progress, until her health declined and deafness prevented her from continued leadership. She then spent her time in prayer and tending the garden, growing flowers for the chapel altar. She died in 1899.

Felicians were called to the United States to teach and care for the children of the many Polish families immigrating to this country in the last quarter of the 19th century. The first five came to the frontier Polish settlement of Polonia, Wis., in 1874, to open the community's first school, an orphanage and a school for Felician aspirants. The motherhouse of the first U.S. province later was transferred to Detroit.

The Mother of Good Counsel Province was the third to be formed in America, opening in 1910 in Milwaukee, Wis. The Motherhouse was moved to its present location in Chicago in 1927 as the number of Felician Sisters teaching in Chicago's burgeoning parish school system grew at a rapid pace.

In addition to schools, the sisters have always been concerned with giving care to orphaned or otherwise needy children, the sick and the elderly. Today, they own and operate St. Francis Hospital and South Day Care Center in Milwaukee, St. Mary's Hospital in Centralia, Ill., their own modern infirmary at the Motherhouse, and a large and growing home for the aged, St. Mary's Home, in Manitowoc, Wis. Felicians administer St. Andrew Home, owned by the Chicago Archdiocese, in Niles, Ill.

A Survey of the work of the sisters conducted by the province for the year 1984 showed that the number of students taught at all grade levels, including college, was more than 17,000. In their varied works of mercy, the survey revealed that Chicago Felicians cared for more than 173,000 hospitalized patients, 470 elderly men and woman, and 500 children in day-care and other preschool child services. The Felicians conduct a Psychoeducational Center for children with learning disabilities and Suzuki and Orff music education program for children at Felician College.●

SOCIAL SECURITY DISABILITY REGULATIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JONES] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the administration released yesterday for public comment, new regulations to implement the medical improvement standard required by the Disability Benefits Reform Act of 1984. That legislation was enacted last year after several years of chaos and controversy in the Social Security Disability Program, in an attempt to provide fair and equitable standards for review of disabled beneficiaries. Both Houses of Congress were unanimous in supporting that legislation which sought to prevent in the future the kind of arbitrary termination of benefits which had resulted in several hundred thousand beneficiaries losing their benefits since 1980.

I am encouraged that the administration is proceeding with the open regulatory process, and it is clear that the public will have much to say about these new regulations. Since the medical improvement standard was really the heart of the disability bill, these regulations will determine whether the bill really accomplishes the congressional aim of restoring fair standards to the disability process. In addition, many other regulations are now being issued to implement all the other provisions of the legislation, and the Social Security Administration is taking other actions as well to implement the bill.

My Subcommittee on Social Security will be conducting several oversight hearings this summer, possibly beginning later this month, to carefully examine this implementation process, and to monitor SSA's progress in putting the legislation in place. In additon, we will be looking at other aspects of the DI Program, such as hearings and appeals, which need continuing examination. I will be reporting back to my colleagues on the findings of these oversight hearings, which are necessary to insure that the good intent of Congress is translated into appropriate actions.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the gentleman from Florida [Mr. NELSON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, due to official business in my congressional district, I was unable to be present for rollcall votes on procedural motions Monday, April 29, 1985. Had I been present I would have voted "aye" on rollcall No. 76, to approve the Journal; "nay" on rollcall No. 77, motion to adjourn; "aye" on rollcall vote Nos. 78 and 79, ordering seconds on Senate Concurrent Resolution 37 and House Concurrent Resolution 130.●

ON THE INSIDE LOOKING OUT FROM NICARAGUA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, Members of Congress have strong and oftentimes passionate views on the issue of U.S. policy in Central America; and we are protected under the Constitution, which provides a privilege to say whatever our consciences compel us to state during debate on whatever issue we choose to address.

The recent debate on Nicaragua demonstrated concern and confusion on the question of U.S. policy in Central America. Last Sunday April 28, 1985, the New York Times Magazine published an article on Nicaragua written by the famous Peruvian novelist Mario Vargas Llosa. Senor Llosa makes incisive observations about the Contras:

This is a war between poor men. Most of the contras, like the badly wounded Sandinista soldiers that I have seen, are peasants. Many have only a vague idea of what they are fighting for. Some think that they are fighting Yankee imperialism. Others, judging by Contra leaflets, believe that they are engaged in a crusade against the forces of Satan.

Mr. Speaker, I include the article written by Senor Llosa as a part of my special order today to give Members who are interested in this issue an insight that was missing during the debate last week. Most often on foreign policy questions we Members are speaking from a position of the outside looking in. This article by the distinguished Peruvian novelist gives us an inside view from the perspective of a Latin looking out.

NICARAGUA

(By Mario Vargas Liosa)

Is Nicaragua a Marxist-Leninist state? Is it another Cuba or is it on its way to becoming one? To find the answers to these questions, I traveled to the heart of the revolution.

En route to Nicaragua, I made a stop in Venezuela, where a friend expressed his amazement. "You? In Managua? That place is practically another Cuba. With your reputation as a right-winger, things could go badly for you. Be careful." (For reasons that elude me, anyone defending freedom of expression, free elections and political pluralism in Latin America is known as a right-winger among the areas's intellectuals.)

Actually, I wasn't careful at all. Instead of going badly, things went so well that I was worn out—bone-tired from the hospitality lavished on me by the Sandinistas and by the opponents of the regime. During my monthlong trip in January, I talked to hundreds of people. I traveled through most of the country, where fewer than three million people live in an area somewhat larger than that of Greece. And I found striking differences between Nicaragua and Cuba.

By its fifth year, Fidel Castro's Cuba had become a Soviet satellite. Cuba's economic and military survival depended on the Soviet Union. Every sign of opposition had been suppressed. The private sector was eliminated. The party bureaucracy had extended its tentacles throughout the country and ideological regimentation was absolute.

In Nicaragua, five and a half years after the fall of the dictator Anastasio Somoza Debayle, a pluralist society—even though it is under stringent state control—still exists. Private enterprise dominates agriculture, cattle raising, commerce and industry. Political opponents openly denounce the regime through the Democratic Coordinator, a coalition of anti-Sandinista political parties, labor unions and business groups. And despite severe censorship, criticism can be found in La Prensa, the weekly Paso a Paso, and two or three radio news programs.

There is no doubt that political opposition is tolerated because it is not very effective. As the November elections demonstrated, the Sandinistas do not allow competition on real terms (they refused to postpone the elections in order to complete negotiations with the popular Coordinator coalition so that its candidates could appear on the ballot). But it is also true that the opposition is not subjected to the terror and paranoia that threaten all dissidence in a totalitarian state.

Nicaragua, which now plays host to thousands of visible and invisible advisers from the Soviet Union, Cuba and the countries of the Eastern bloc, receives military and technical assistance from these countries. But Nicaragua is far from being a satellite of the Soviet Union—not because of a decision by the Sandinistas, who would, I believe, have been glad to place themselves under Moscow's protection, but because of Soviet reluctance to assume the burden of another Cuba or to risk a direct confrontation with the United States. (During my stopover in Venezuela, President Jaime Lusinchi told me that he had asked the Soviet Union if it was planning to send MIG's to Nicaragua; the reply he received through the Russian Ambassador was: "We're not that crazy.") This explains Fidel Castro's speech late last year in which he announced what everybody already knew: that Cuba would maintain a prudent neutrality if Nicaragua were invaded. He urged the Sandinistas to reach a negotiated settlement with the United States within the framework of the Contadora agreement. (The treaty was first put forward last year by the Contadora nations of Latin America as their proposal for a peaceful settlement for Central America.)

Limited aid from Moscow, combined with internal resistance to the establishment of a Marxist-Leninist regime, economic disasters brought on by nationalization and statism in the early years of the revolution, as well as deprivations caused by rebel terrorism and sabotage, have all served to moderate the Sandinistas' Communist stance.

They now appear to be following a vaguely neutral, nationalist and socialist political model—one that they believe will make the regime's survival and the achievement of domestic peace more likely. If this direction is maintained, there is a chance that the Sandinista regime will evolve into a loose socialist dictatorship independent of the Soviet Union. Yet, one cannot rule out the possibility of a sudden return to the Sandinistas' original intentions (to turn Nicaragua into a Marxist-Leninist state) should the external circumstances change—for instance, if the Soviet Union should suddenly decide to take Nicaragua under its wing.

In the meantime, the Sandinistas have boldly announced they would sign the Contadora agreement, devalue their currency, reduce subsidies to transportation and abolish those for certain basic goods. They have also announced a moratorium on arms purchases and promised that 100 of the Cuban military advisers—a fraction of the total—would be sent home. They are declaring that their regime is a nonaligned, pluralist mixed economy. That is now half true, but it could be a reality if in exchange for their concessions, they could obtain peace and guarantees of non-intervention.

In Nicaragua, myth and reality often go hand in hand.

One day, Vice President Sergio Ramirez Mercado said to me while I was having supper at his house: "I suppose you know the motive behind the wining and dining by the Sandinistas and the reactionaries. We all want you to say nice things about us in your article and bad things about the other side."

Ramirez is a 43-year-old novelist with a fine sense of humor; we've been friends since before the Nicaraguan revolution. He lived in West Berlin and was head of a university press in Costa Rica before the resolution. Ramirez's enemies say that he exaggerates his radicalism in public so that he won't lose influence with his Sandinista comrades; in fact, they say, he is one of the most moderate men in the regime.

It is an interesting twist: a Sandinista accused of being a closet moderate. During my month in Nicaragua, I came across many such ironies. Take Managua, the capital. I used to think that the most labyrinthine city in the world was Tokyo. I was wrong; it's Managua.

The earthquake of 1972, which destroyed most of the city, has left vast ghostly spaces in the center of Managua. The Sandinistas have converted part of the Gran Hotel, severely damaged in the earthquake, into a theater. There, on Jan. 9, three days after my arrival, on a stage built over what once was a swimming pool, Commander Daniel Ortega Saavedra presented a folkloric program for the foreign delegations that had come for his presidential inauguration, held the next day.

The Government had provided me with an escort, the novelist Lizandro Chávez Alfaro, director of the National Library. He is maniacally punctual, insisting I arrive at my appointments an hour ahead of time. That day was no exception, which was fortunate. As the other guests were arriving, I had had the opportunity of touring a section of the hotel that now houses a Museum of Modern Art. It was a brilliant idea to display abstract, surrealist and primitive paintings and sculptures among ruins that looked as if they had been designed exprofeso by a daringly imaginative architect. I could never find the ruins of the Gran Hotel again. People would give me directions, but I could never follow them.

The streets of the rebuilt capital are all side streets: they have no names and the houses have no numbers. Directions are pure conundrums. "Go 70 varas up and 20 down from where the little tree used to be." What little tree are they talking about? A tree that once existed in the past, no one knows when, at a spot where there is now nothing, but Managuans still use the "tree" as a point of reference. A vara, roughly three feet, is a medieval Castilian measurement that nobody else in the world uses except the Nicaraguans. And how does one interpret "up" and "down"? I was given a variety of explanations. According to some, "up" is the east, where the airport is located; "down" is the west, where you find the cemetery. According to others, both terms come from the Indians, for whom "up" meant where the sun rises and "down" referred to where it sets.

Outside Managua, I was entranced by the variety and beauty of a landscape dotted with lakes, volcanoes, jungles, rugged mountains and plains that support a thriving cattle industry. To travel the Atlantic coast, official permission is required because of the battles between the Government and the 70,000 Miskito Indians, a third of whom have fled to Honduras. In the rest of the country, one can travel freely, even along the northern frontier with Honduras, where there is a strong anti-Sandinista rebel presence. (A map of Nicaragua appears on page 44.)

On some trips I was accompanied by the affiable Lizandro Chávez, who is a native of Bluefields on the Atlantic coast. On others, I was alone. I was surprised by the lax security measures and the general normalcy of life, even in Esteli and Jinotega, where abandoned villages, destroyed cooperatives, blackened wrecks of burned vehicles and other signs of war with the contrarevolucionarios are everywhere. Bluefields and its environs where the only areas where I noticed a certain anxiety in ordinary residents. Yet attacks and incursions by rebel Miskitos there are less frequent than along the Honduran border.

Chávez arranged the interviews with governmental officials, and I took care of interviews with the opposition myself—at least for the first few days. By the second week, I wondered how I would find the time to squeeze in conversations with just a third of the ministers, owners, farmers, former political prisoners, businessmen, unionists, journalists, priests, feminists, evangelicals and poets (even madmen with "essential information" for my article) who had contacted me. At the same time, I was deluged with invitations to social events.

Nicaraguan hospitality is legendary, but the invitations were symtomatic of the importance that both the regime and its opponents place on what is said about Nicaragua outside the country. Both sides know that the fate of Sandinism is being decided not only inside but also outside Nicaragua, especially in the United States.

THE SANDINISTAS WON'T BUDGE ON POWER SHARING

Although the Sandinistas may be prepared to make almost any concession to restore peace to their country, they are obdurate about one point: They will not relinquish power. The desire to hold on to power is, of course, not peculiar to the Sandinistas. It characterizes totalitarian and authoritarian regimes, even the discreet dictatorship of the Institutional Revolutionary Party in Mexico. Don Emilio Alvarez Montalbán, an ophthalmologist and a conservative, is a respected political analyst for the opposition who has a keen appreciation of the ironic. One evening he says to me: "Every day this revolution smells less and less of Moscow and more and more of Mexico City." I tend to agree with him.

Most of the opposition, however, respond angrily to any suggestion that the ruling Sandinista Front is less than totalitarian. At their meetings, they cite examples of human-rights abuses, the mockery of the Anti-Somocista People's Tribunals, the harassment of free trade unions, the abolition of the right to strike, the cancellation of 24 radio news programs, the contradictory decrees and threats of confiscation leveled against the business community, the Marxist indoctrination of the young in the schools and the army.

Those attending the meetings are not circumspect in their choice of words. Some, after giving their full name, make ferocious—and unverifiable—attacks on the Commanders: They have stolen the best homes; they have a house of assignation on the Southern Highway; they have turned Sacuanjoche Restaurant into a place where Cubans, Russians, Bulgarians and the other Communist advisers can indulge their orgiastic fantasies.

When I say that in the totalitarian countries of my acquaintance a meeting like theirs would be inconceivable, they reproach me for my naïveté. Can't I see that this kind of "tactical" tolerance will soon end? They are risking their freedom, perhaps their lives, by speaking up.

I always leave these meetings admiring their tough stand, but skeptical of their effectiveness. The civilian opposition appears to be associations of the elite, so prone to internecine wrangling that they leave themselves open to the Sandinistas' divide-and-conquer tactics. Almost all of the opposition parties—the Democratic Conservatives, the Liberals, the Christian Socialists and the Social Democrats—have a splinter group in the National Assembly.

There are capable and highly intelligent men among the opposition leaders, but their overall political activity is impractical. They refuse, for instance, to admit that it was a mistake to boycott the November elections. Regardless of how fraudulent they may have been (they were no more rigged than the ritual elections in Mexico or the ones held recently in Panama), participation would have given the opposition more representatives on the national level (the non-Marxist opposition parties took 29 seats in the 96-member Assembly), more clout in denouncing official excesses and errors, as well as the opportunity to exert some influence on the system.

Instead, they preach a legalism and an orthodox liberal democracy that Nicaragua has never had and that, sadly, it probably will not have in the near future. By telling each other, and trying to convince everyone else, that the country is now, or is about to become, a totalitarian satellite of the Soviet Union, they have adopted the politics of catastrophe—of waiting for the contras, aided by the United States Marines, to rescue them.

And who are the contras? The Sandinistas call them "mercenaries" and "gangs"; President Reagan calls them "freedom fighters." Most of them are in the Nicaraguan Democratic Force, which operates out of Honduras and is led by Adolfo Calero Portocarrero, former head of the Conservative Party. Then there is the Revolutionary Democratic Alliance in the south, along the Costa Rican border, which is headed by Edén Pastora Gómez, the former Sandinista.

The Government and the opposition versions of the war with the contras are so contradictory that trying to see the two sides clearly often leads to confusion. But one point is clear: The "bourgeoisie" is not at the front. This is a war between poor men. Most of the contras—like the badly wounded Sandinista soldiers I saw in the Germán Pomares Field Hospital in Jinotega—are peasants. Many have only a vague idea of what they are fighting for. Some think they are fighting Yankee imperialism. Others, judging by contra leaflets, believe that they are engaged in a crusade against the forces of Satan.

The contras can inflict a great deal of damage on the Sandinista regime. Perhaps they can do more harm than they have already (7,968 casualties in four years, according to President Ortega; the equivalent figure in the United States would be 600,000), but they have no chance of overthrowing the Government. The support they enjoy in certain peasant and bourgeois quarters is not enough to provoke a general uprising similar to the one that toppled Somoza.

Furthermore, the contras' economic and military dependence on the Central Intelligence Agency and the United States arouses irremediable suspicion even among those who are hostile to the Sandinistas—who remember the numerous North American interventions and occupations, especially the one that left the Somoza dynasty as its legacy. Pablo Antonio Cuadra, the noted Roman Catholic poet, writer and co-editor of La Prensa, and one of the most respected of the opposition figures, tells me that "the C.I.A.'s covert aid to the contras has been a very serious mistake."

A North American invasion is not the solution if one is trying to preserve democratic options in Nicaragua. The kind of massive, and bloody, military intervention that will be needed to overthrow the Sandinistas will not result in a democracy. Only a dictatorship can impose order in a country devastated by terrorism and civil war. To maintain the existing fragile freedoms under the present regime, the only choice for the opposition is to reach some kind of an agreement with the Sandinistas. Although the regime has traveled far down the road toward totalitarianism, the challenges and difficulties it faces are an inducement to compromise. Because the opposition parties do not recognize this, they have become marginal to the central political realities of Nicaragua.

THE MODIFYING INFLUENCE OF CAPITALISM

The groups that have been effective in forcing the Sandinistas to modify their Marxist-Leninist intentions are the farmers and industrialists. Unlike their Cuban counterparts a quarter of a century ago, they did not fly to Miami when the Government turned progressively Communist soon after it came into power.

Enrique Bolaños Geyer, a prosperous industrialist, rancher and farmer, is a steadfast critic of Sandinism. He is also president of the Superior Council of Private Enterprise (known as Cosep), the country's largest business federation that had financed three political strikes against the Somoza regime in 1974. "Bolaños's problem, and Cosep's problem, is that they haven't resigned themselves to their loss of political power," claims Vice President Sergio Ramirez. "We have no difficulty in reaching an understanding with Carlos Pellas, the multimillionaire, or other industralists who discuss credits, foreign currency, stocks and investments with us. But no capitalist will ever be president of the Central Bank again, or dictate our economic policy, and that is what Cosep cannot accept." Perhaps he is right. But beneath the apparently incompatible doctrines, there are signs of cooperation between the capitalist sector and the regime.

Before the Sandinista revolution, the Pellas family was, after the Somozas, the second richest. The family still has vast holdings, the most important of which is the San Antonio Refinery in Chichigalpa. I spent a day there, escorted by the young, dynamic Carlos Pellas, who elected to stay in Nicaragua when his father and brothers moved to Miami. There are 3,000 workers on the payroll (5,300 during the harvest), and about 20,000 people who live on company-owned land. In recent years, there has been a decrease in production, stemming from an affliction whose ravages can be seen everywhere: the scarcity of foreign currency.

The Government's delay in giving the refinery dollars to pay for repairs and replacement parts meant that many of its trucks and tractors were out of service, and the transport of sugar cane to the factory was reduced drastically. Moreover, rats devoured some 200 tons of sugar cane because the refinery did not receive the $100,000 it had requested to buy poison. "Because we couldn't get that money on time," says Pellas, "we've lost 400,000 quintales of sugar; that's approximately $2,700,000." (A quintale is about 100 pounds.)

Since the revolution, about 70 of the company's technicians and professionals have left the country. Two of the currently employed engineers have moved their families to Costa Rica and visit them every two weeks. Why? "So that our children won't be called up for patriotic military service, and because we're afraid the country will become Communist."

As often as they voice fears that the Sandinista Government is headed toward Communism—a fear common among the middle class—the refinery's professionals complain about the lack of worker discipline that Sandinism has brought with it and of the high cost to the owners of continuing to pay the salaries of workers conscripted into the army.

Nevertheless, the San Antonio Refinery is expanding (by expanding, an owner not only gets more foreign currency but shows his faith in the Government). The San Antonio Refinery has built a new mill that will equal the output of its factory. "I think the company is secure for another five years," says Pellas. "Only God knows after that."

The man touted by the regime as its "capitalist" is Samuel Amador. "He's the capitalist we show to foreigners so they won't think we're Communists," jokes Vice President Ramírez when he introduces me to Amador. It is a role the flamboyant 48-year-old farmer and rancher plays marvelously well.

I spend a weekend with him in Sébaco, 66 miles from Managua, in his mansion with its marble, its two gigantic heart-shaped swimming pools and its 11 dogs. It is the house of a Nicaraguan Great Gatsby. "It cost me $800,000," Amador tells me as he raises his little finger with its flashing diamond ring. What is $800,000 to a man happy to have lost $2.5 million during the war that overthrew Somoza? He has just been elected Sandinista representative to the National Assembly.

That weekend, Commander Jaime Wheelock Román, the Minister of Agrarian Reform, and 50 North Americans arrive by bus for supper. Amador tells his visitors that the best proof that "Nicaragua will never be Marxist" lies in his four estates, his 3,750 acres of rice, sorghum and vegetables, his livestock, his new houses in Matagalpa, his 180 employees, the vineyards he intends to plant, and the tourist project he will launch this year in the Jinotega Mountains.

He introduces me to his two teen-age sons, "volunteers in the coffee harvest," who, he assures me, will do their patriotic military service. "For now they're turbas, so what?" ("Turbas," a derogatory term for the masses, or mob, are civilians used by the Sandinistas for political intimidation. "Yes, we are the turbas, so what?" has become their rallying cry.)

At night, as we stroll through his garden-full of frogs, he confesses that his happiness is not absolute. He has two daughters living in California who refuse to visit him and who write to him that "one day the Communists will slit your throat." When I ask him if there is anything in the regime that isn't perfect, he says: "A.T.C." (the Association of Rural Workers, the official peasants' union). They have taken over his lands twice, and Amador has had to use all his influence to dislodge them.

According to Cosep, the private sector is a fiction in Nicaragua. "What kind of landowners are we?" its members ask. "The state decides what we should plant and when we should plant it. We can sell only to the state, only at the price it sets. It pays in cordobas and decides when, and in what currency, it will give us money for upkeep and equipment. With the banks nationalized, we have to depend on the state for credit, too. And we live with the threat that they'll confiscate our land on the pretext that we're sabotaging the economy."

The Sandinistas' point of view is quite different. "We are saving the private sector in Nicaragua," claims Commander Wheelock. I accompany him as he escorts the Prime Minister of Iran, Mir Hussein Moussavi, on a tour of the Cuban-built Timal Refinery in Malacatoya, 14 miles from Managua, which is the biggest refinery in Nicaragua and which was opened by Fidel Castro on Jan. 11.

"The peasant masses were hungry and angered by the exploitation they had suffered," Wheelock continues. "They were pressing for the lands, and there were many unjustified takeovers. But thanks to agrarian reform, which has distributed two million manzanas"—about 3.7 million acres—"and because the peasants trust us, we have avoided widespread expropriation of private holdings. We are slowly rectifying whatever abuses may have taken place."

I ask him why employers are not allowed to pay their workers bonuses or give them higher salaries than those set by the state. His reply: "To avoid the anarchy that would result during the current crisis if there were rivalry between employees of different companies, and to avoid the creation of privileged elements within the working class."

Relations between the owners and the Sandinistas, although full of mistrust, are not alway negative. Seventy-five private rice growers organized the National Association of Rice Growers in 1979 and are affiliated with Cosep. They are proud that their 22,500 acres produce 50 percent of the rice grown in Nicaragua—that is, 92 million pounds, which is the output of the 35,000 state-owned acres the Government expropriated from Somoza. None of the 75 have been exiled or had their property confiscated. Three plantations were taken over, but the rice growers' association moved heaven and earth and managed to recover them.

"After endless negotiations," says Mario Hanón, the association's president, "we convinced them to let us open our own marketing association. We handle 90 percent of the private production and 10 percent of the state harvest as well, since the state companies have discovered that if they sell rice to our marketing association, payment is fast and reliable, which is not the case with the state marketing agency.

"We can't sell freely, only to buyers sent by the state, but at least our rice is processed and sold efficiently," continues Hanón. A short, energetic man in his early 50's, Hanón is an engineer who was imprisoned by the Sandinistas for four months soon after they took over. "At the National Rice Commission . . . we have marathon discussions with the Government delegates, but, I must confess, they've always set a price—at least until now—that meets our expectations."

The leaders of the rice growers' association says that they have earned the respect of the Sandinistas, which is why they were allowed to establish a research company specializing in fertilizers, as well as a seed-exporting plant.

"It may be that not all the trade associations are as united as we are," says Hanón. "We're like a fist. As soon as there are rumors of confiscations, we hire lawyers, we swamp the regime with letters, lawsuits, claims, requests for meetings. We knock on Commander Wheelock's door, and if he doesn't open it we climb in through the window. The Cuban advisers for the state rice plantations were a disaster, and that worked in our favor, too."

As I say goodbye to Hanón and his colleagues in the association's office in downtown Managua, I tell them that at least from their perspective, the future of private enterprise does not seem so dismal. "We've put a tape in our heads that plays the same thing over and over," says Hanón. "'Nothing's happened here; let's get to work.' The trouble is that sometimes the tape breaks and we remember the crisis, the war, the insecurity. That's when we begin reeling—and we're not even drunk."

BUSINESS IS BRISK IN THE BLACK MARKET

It covers 10 or 12 blocks in the eastern end of Managua, and its multicolored displays in crowded kiosks, stalls and counters recall the bazaars of the Middle East. It is called the Oriental Market—Nicaragua's black-market heaven.

The shelves in the supermarkets and stores that sell merchandise at Government-fixed prices are usually half-empty, and people have to wait on long lines to buy subsidized or rationed goods. But go to the Oriental Market and nothing is scarce and there are no lines. Prices, however, are much higher than the official ones.

When I was in Nicaragua, toothpaste—officially priced at 27 cordobas (equivalent to $1)—was not for sale anywhere except at the Oriental Market, where it cost $7. The tailors' cooperatives were supposed to sell jeans for $18, but the supply did not even remotely match the demand. Jeans were available at the Oriental Market for $180. The Oriental Market also dispensed medicines that were in short supply at the pharmacies.

What the Sandinista Government had intended to do was to protect the "real wages" of the workers and, through price controls and subsidies, to price essential goods within reach of even the poorest citizen; in January the average monthly salary for a worker ranged between $110 and $150. But, some say, this policy has turned Nicaragua into a country of speculators, hoarders and smugglers—a country where the most profitable business is the channeling of good from the legal economy into the black market.

I mentioned to a Government official that the only people who benefitted from this system were the wealthy, that it actually harmed the poor for whom the system had been created. "That's the problem when you set up socialism halfway," he said. "If we had nationalized the entire economy, this corruption would not exist."

A few days after I left Nicaragua, I read in the paper that the Sandinista regime had decided to abolish subsidies for agricultural products and to allow the free market to determine prices.

PLAYING POLITICS WITH THE CHURCH

Nicaragua is one of the most Catholic countries I know. When I was traveling through the department of Estelí, I saw caravans of peasants in their Sunday clothes, many of them barefoot to fulfill a vow, who were walking to the Sanctuary of Our Lord of Esquipulas in El Sauce, some 45 miles away. Every Nicaraguan village has its saint and honors its patron's feast with a celebration that usually lasts several days and includes festive processions and rituals.

Religion has long been inseparable from politics in Nicaragua, but perhaps the most critical debate in the country today is between the "peoples church" and the Government on one side, and the church hierarchy and the majority of the faithful on the other.

Many Catholics fought with the Sandinistas against Somoza, and almost all the leaders of the Sandinista National Liberation Front (F.S.L.N.)—even those most devoted to Marxism like Tomás Borge Martínez, the Minister of the Interior, or Carlos Fonseca Amador, a founder of the Front—had a Catholic education. The Catholic hierarchy had frequent confrontations with Somoza, and after his overthrow gave the Sandinistas its blessing in a pastoral letter. But the support was shortlived. It ended with the radicalization of the regime and the rise to prominence within the Government of the "people's church," which advocates a synthesis of Marxism and Christianity. The supporters of this movement claim that the first duty of Christians is commitment to the revolution, and they identify sin with "unjust capitalist social structures."

"We are not a parallel church, but a reform movement that is trying to live in solidarity with the poor," says José Argüello, editor of Amanecer, which is published by the Antonio Valdivieso Ecumenical Center. "For us the problem is not whether the revolution is moving toward Marxism, but whether it is going to survive. The alternative is not democracy but something like the situation in Guatemala or El Salvador. A Marxist country is better than a dead one."

Ernesto Cardenal Martínez—a priest, poet, Minister of Culture and one of the most extreme advocates of the "people's church"—has proclaimed that the "true Kingdom of God is a Communist society, and Marxism is the only solution for the world." (Cardenal, one of four revolutionary priests in the Sandinista Government, was recently suspended a divinis for not resigning his ministerial post.) Nicaragua has consequently become the magnet for liberation theologians, Socialist Catholics, radical theologians, apocalyptic prophets and Marxist-Leninist priests from all over the world.

Its name notwithstanding, the "people's church" is largely composed of members of the religious elite—priests and laymen whose intellectual disquisitions and sociopolitical work lie beyond the scope of most of the Catholic poor. The majority of Nicaraguan Catholics, like Catholics in the rest of Latin America, do not practice the reflective, intellectualized, critical religion that the "people's church" espouses. On the contrary, theirs is a simple, intuitive, disciplined and ritualized faith that has always strengthened the church in Latin America. The efforts of the leaders of the "people's church" to combine politics and religion have only found a response in the intellectually militant members of the middle class, many of whom are already converts.

The most outstanding figure in the "people's church," the Franciscan Uriel Molina, is saying a solidarity mass in the church of Santa Maria de los Angeles in Managua's Rigueiro District, where he has been priest for many years. The chapel is circular and bare of statues except for one of the Virgin. There are, however, huge revolutionary murals in which Christ is dressed as a Nicaraguan peasant and villainous Yankee imperialists and well-fed soldiers shoot young people carrying Sandinista flags. The Peasant Mass, by the composer Carlos Mejia Godoy, is punctuated with revolutionary songs written to very pretty music.

The lesson in Father Molina's sermon deals with the "process of revolutionary social change which Christians should experience through their faith." When the time comes for the embrace of peace, the mass turns into a political meeting. More than half of those attending are North American visitors. Encouraged by the presence of state television cameras, they rush toward Commander Tomas Borge, who is beside me, kiss him, photograph him and ask him for his autograph. I whisper to him: "The revolution's in trouble—this looks like Hollywood."

"Most Nicaraguan Catholics," says the Archbishop of Nicaragua, Miguel Obando y Bravo, "are loyal to the bishops and the Pope." There is strong evidence he is right.

I see it as the Festival of San Sebastian in Diriamba, where a lively crowd gives an old priest an ovation when he takes the microphone as the procession begins and shouts: "The Communists are responsible for this war, and they're forcing our boys into the army to fight it." And I see it most of all in the excitement Monsignor Obando generates in his public appearances.

When I attend mass at his church of Santo Domingo de Las Sierrietas on the outskirts of Managua, Nicaraguans of all classes—waving Nicaraguan and Vatican flags—receive the Archbishop with applause (it is his birthday) and cheers for the Pope. Beneath the traditional appearance of the church and its traditional decorations, everything, including the congregation's exaggerated enthusiasm, is as politically charged as it was in the Rigueiro District. (Ever since John Paul II's visit to Nicaragua in 1983, the Pope has become a buzz word: Cheering him is equivalent to protesting against the regime.)

At 59, Monsignor Obando is a charismatic personality. His cardinal's vestments cannot hide his rugged Indian features and his compact peasant's body. In contrast to his adversaries, Monsignor Obando has no intellectual pretensions. He is a conservative like John Paul II, with whom he is on very good terms. He combines commitment to tradition and ecclesiastical authority with a sense of justice and a notable ability to communicate his spiritual message to humble people.

"The regime is not totalitarian yet, but every day there are more signs that it is moving in that direction," he says. "We are in favor of reform. We are opposed to the great economic gap between rich and poor. But social justice is one thing, and filling a country with hatred, preaching the class struggle, advocating war to the death between capital and labor—that is another matter entirely."

I tell him what Tomás Borge told me: "We're worried that the C.I.A. will try to assassinate Monsignor Obando and blame us." The Archbishop sighs. "Somoza said the same thing: 'I'm afraid that the Sandinistas will kill you and blame me.' And he tried to give me protection, which of course I refused, just as I had refused the Mercedes-Benz he wanted to give me as a gift. Tell Commander Borge that he doesn't have to send me protectors, because I already have four of them: the Father, the Son, the Holy Spirit, and myself."

He tells me that in late 1983 a peculiar incident occurred. On his way home from a pastoral in the country, "three armed men dressed as soldiers stopped the car; only the driver and I were in it. They forced their way in and made us drive to an isolated spot and park. In the darkness they insulted me and said they were going to kill me. I always carry a two-way radio and I managed to shout into it what was going on. This surprised them, and they ran away. Apparently their orders were just to frighten me."

Pastoral letters of the Nicaraguan bishops criticizing the regime have touched on highly controversial issues, such as the conflict between the Sandinistas and Miskito Indians; the church blames the situation on acts of violence by the Government. But the pastoral letter of a year ago provoked the greatest furor when it advocated a dialogue between the Government and the contras. The Sandinistas have steadfastly refused to negotiate with the rebels.

It is, however, the church's frontal attack against Marxism, perhaps even more than the economic crisis or external pressures, that has been a moderating influence on the regime. The Sandinista Directorate recently established a dialogue with the bishop's conference. While I was in Nicaragua, there were two private meetings, one between Monsignor Obando and President Ortega, and another between President Ortega and the president of the bishops' conference, Msgr. Pablo Antonio Vega, but the results were not made public.

The peasant village of Cuapa is in the department of Chontales, in the center of Nicaragua. One night in 1981 the sacristan, Bernardo, went into the church and saw a brilliant light that radiated from the Virgin and illuminated the entire chapel. The phenomenon disappeared when Bernardo switched on the electric light.

One morning three weeks later, when he was fishing along the river, the sacristan suddenly felt great joy. The landscape around him began to change: the sun was in eclipse, he heard birdsong and the rustling of leaves, and he saw flashes of lightning. A cloud descended to earth. On the cloud was a beautiful, barefoot young woman, with her hands clasped, a cape embroidered with jewels wrapped around her, a crown of stars on her head. She had chestnut hair, honey-colored eyes, bronzed skin. She stretched out her hands and a feeling of warmth flooded through the sacristan. "What is your name?" he stammered. "My name is Mary." "Where do you come from?" "From heaven. I am the Mother of God."

This first vision took place on May 8. There were four more, in June, July and September, always on the eighth of the month. The sacristan was also summoned on Aug. 8, but he couldn't respond because the river was in flood and he could not cross over. In his last vision, it was not the young woman who appeared to him but a little girl about 8 years old.

In the first vision, the Virgin asked Nicaraguans to say the rosary with their families, and she exhorted them to love one another, to fulfill their obligations and to make peace. She also said: "Nicaragua has suffered a great deal since the earthquake, and if you do not change, Nicaragua will continue to suffer and you will hasten the coming of the Third World War."

The message was unequivocal in the second vision. Bernardo asked her what she thought of the Sandinistas. Her answer: "They are atheists, Communists and that is why I have come to help the Nicaraguans. They have not kept their promises. If you ignore what I ask, Communism will spread throughout America. But you must not leave the country; you must not turn your back on your problems. If you listen to my pleas, Nicaragua will be the light of the world."

Bernardo, a friendly man in his early 40's, tells me the story in a mild voice. We are in the garden of a seminary in Managua where he is in seclusion. He says that he still cannot reveal everything that Mary told him. He has that quiet look of the believer that I find fascinating yet unnerving. He tells me that when Monsignor Vega, who is the Bishop of Juigalpa, authorized him to reveal the miracle, and crowds of pilgrims began to come to Cuapa, three Government officials visited him and offered him a farm with good land and cows, free of charge, if he would say the Virgin was a Sandinista. He answered that he could only tell the truth. They offered a compromise: All he had to do was to stop saying she was anti-Sandinista. "I cannot betray her," he replied.

Then a campaign against him began in Barricada and Nuevo Diario, the two official newspapers, and on television. He was called insane, hysterical, delusional. One morning at dawn, the police broke into his house and tried to kidnap him, but the devout who slept close by came to his rescue. Two years ago, the church brought him to the seminary in Managua to protect him; he takes care of the garden and regales the seminarians with stories of the visitations.

By the time Bernardo was moved to Managua, the Virgin of Cuapa had become an object of veneration in Nicaragua. Tens of thousands of the faithful have crowded into the village, sometimes led by Monsignor Vega and Monsignor Obando. Whenever the censorship allows, La Prensa publicizes the pilgrimages and defends Bernardo. The church hierarchy has let it be known that "the petitions of the Virgin were not in opposition to the teachings of the church."

The efforts of the "people's church" to eradicate "bourgeois mariolatry" have been unsuccessful. During Commander Ortega's inauguration, Monsignor Vega, who read the benediction, cleverly evoked the Virgin of Cuapa before hundreds of guests and millions of television viewers. When the Valdivieso Ecumenical Center tried to counterbalance this "mariolatry charged with potential counterrevolutionary politics" with novenas that proposed a progressive and revolutionary image of the Mother of Christ, the hierarchy declared the novenas impious and denounced the center for anti-Christian activities.

This is not a medieval history. In Nicaragua today, belief or disbelief in the Virgin of Cuapa situates people on one side or the other of the country's ideological conflict.

THE HEAVY HAND OF THE CENSOR

The newspaper La Prensa is the voice and catalyst of the anti-Sandinista opposition. I attend an independent-union meeting of its employees in Managua, which has been called because the Government censor suppressed 60 percent of their copy the day before and the newspaper could not be published.

All copy must be presented to the Ministry of the Interior by midmorning. Three or four hours later, the Director of Media, Lieut. Nelba Cecelia Blandón, returns the materials, indicating the paragraphs, articles, headlines and photographs that must be excised. On the average, a quarter of the paper was censored in 1984, and since censorship was established three years ago, the paper could not publish 29 times. La Prensa has a "morgue" of approved texts that it substitutes for those that have been cut.

During the meeting on Jan. 9, the eve of the anniversary of the assassination of the paper's previous editor—Pedro Joaquín Chamorro (who was reportedly killed by Somoza loyalists)—the staff gives a warm welcome to his widow, Violeta de Chamorro, who often visits the offices of the newspaper which she owns. A motion is approved urging President Ortega to abolish censorship and to end harassment "of our workplace."

Jaime Chamorro, brother of the slain journalist, coedits the paper with Pablo Antonio Cuadra. Chamorro is an important leader of the Conservative Party and one of the most outspoken members of the opposition. He explains that Sandinista persecution takes many forms: intimidation of the paper's distributors by the "turbas" that has forced 20 of its 150 outlets to close; denial of foreign currency to the paper for the importation of raw materials; the withholding to the paper of news items from state agencies, and pressure on contributors and employees to end their association with the paper.

Despite all this, and despite the fact that the paper comes out as late as 6 or 7 in the evening in order to comply with the censorship procedures, La Prensa sells all of the 70,000 copies permitted under the paper quota. On days La Prensa cannot publish, its readers send in the price of the paper as a token of solidarity and in recognition of La Prensa's symbolic value. "I'll stay in the country only until they close it down for good," says an engineer at a sugar refinery.

Is the regime aware that censorship damages its image in the rest of the world? "This is a war of aggression," Tomás Borge explains. "Let the attacks and sabotage against our country by the C.I.A. and the mercenaries end, and censorship will end. We are at war, and every country at war uses censorship to protect security.

He adds that offical publications must also submit to Lieutenant Blandón's scissors. "What happened to Allende in Chile is not going to happen to us," says Daniel Ortega. "Before the coup, the Government was destablized by the C.I.A.-controlled media." Several Sandinistas, Jaime Wheelock among them, lived in Chile during the Allende period, and they are haunted by what happened to the slain leader's party, Popular Unity.

Total censorship, however, is difficult to achieve. Photocopies of suppressed texts circulate from hand to hand; people discuss them on the street and read them to each other on the telephone. And the anti-Sandinista stations—Radio Impacto in Costa Rica and the contras' September 15 that apparently broadcasts from Honduras—are heard everywhere. But perhaps the most serious consequence of censorship is the impoverishment of political debate in the news media. There is, in fact, no debate: There are only attacks and mutual incomprehension.

The level of the two official newspapers is very low. Barricada is made up of communiqués and Nuevo Diario tends toward sensationalism. The editor of Nuevo Diario is Xavier Chamorro, the brother of La Prensa's co-editor. Until recently, Barricada's editor was Carlos Fernando Chamorro, son of La Prensa's slain editor. A reserved, secretive young man who spouts the passionate and truculent slogans of the Sandinistas, Carlos Chamorro is now in charge of the Government's Propaganda Department.

In many minds, the Chamorro family has become a symbol of a divided country. Violeta de Chamorro, an elegant, courageous woman whom history has pushed to the front lines, assures me that her divided family (and there are many such families in Nicaragua today) still meets occasionally for lunch, and that they talk to one another cordially about everything except politics. Mrs. Chamorro herself was a member of the Provisional Government, but resigned because of differences with the Sandinistas.

Censorship has so exacerbated La Prensa's opposition to the Government that although Lieutenant Blandón censors one-quarter of the copy every day, with what remains the paper manages to strike a blow against the regime even when it seems to be reporting the weather or the miracles of the Virgin. Nicaraguans decipher the allusions and barbs just as the Spaniards did during Franco's last years when censorship was beginning to weaken and newspaper readers routinely read between the lines. La Prensa, which questioned the validity of the November elections, never calls Commander Ortega "President of Nicaragua." It always refers to him as the "Executive Officeholder"—the same term Pedro Joaquín Chamorro used for Anastasio Somoza Debayle.

THE LAST OF THE ORIGINAL FOUNDERS

Commander Tomás Borge, Minister of the Interior, is one of the nine members of the National Directorate of the Sandinista Front. He is the sole survivor of the five who founded the Front in 1961. Born into a poor family from Matagalpa, he went to school with Carlos Fonseca Amador, another of the Front's founders, and he began to conspire against Somoza when he was 14. He spent six and a half of his 54 years in prison, five in the mountains as a guerrilla and 19 years in hiding.

He is the oldest of the Commanders of the Revolution (the rest are in their 30's), the most talkative, the one most inclined to confuse desire with reality, and the most amiable. He is a short man with curly hair, a broad chest and vaguely Oriental features. His exuberance charms journalists. At a dinner with foreign correspondents in Managua, the reporters unanimously describe Borge as "the only Commander whose speeches aren't boring."

If it is true that all Nicaraguans have a kind of natural addiction to poetic imagery—Nicaragua has a higher percentage of good poets than any other Latin American country—in Tomás Borge this trait has been honed to a perversion. In front of the Ministry "Guardian of the People's Happiness." The title of his book on Carlos Fonseca is "Carlos, Dawn Is No Longer a Temptation."

Writers are often guests at Borge's house. He is an avid reader, and I am certain he suffers from a frustrated literary vocation. Although I sometimes think he idealizes and colors Nicaraguan reality until it turns into science fiction, at other times I am convinced that he speaks with utmost candor.

On the day of our first interview, we are in the simple house where he lives with his wife and several young children. He says it is a shame I write good novels but have such bad political ideas, and I respond by asking if what they say about him is true: that he is the hardnose of the revolution, Moscow's man and Cuba's tough guy, a fanatical

Marxist and Communist. The part that bothers him is "hardnose." "They say that about me? I'm the softest of the bunch. Let me tell you something. If I had been the candidate in the November elections, the bourgeoisie in this country would have voted for me. Know something else? The prisoners' children love me."

"We're the only revolution in the world that hasn't shot anybody, that has abolished the death penalty," he says. "And as for my police, all you have to do is walk down the street to see how respectful they are toward the people. This is the only country in Latin America where nobody's afraid of the police. Just yesterday I sent some cops to break up a strike—the workers had taken over the premises. I arrived a little later and what do you think I saw? The strikers and the cops were having beer together!"

Days later, when he learns that I am going to attend Father Uriel Molina's solidarity mass, he suggests we go together. We arrive early and walk along the miserable unpaved streets, past the shanties of plywood and tin in the Rigueiro District. There is no wild cheering when the poor recognize Borge, but many of them wave, call him by his first name, and some even brave his guards—soldiers armed with machine guns—to embrace him. He is the classic politician: He kisses babies, picks up children, and gives the pencils and the ballpoint pens he has in his pocket to anybody who asks for one.

After mass we go to eat at Lobster's Inn. The after-dinner conversation lasts more than four hours. I ask him if he misses his life in the mountains. "Not at all, I'm a city man. Those five years as a guerrilla were terrible. A guerrilla's life seems very romantic, but it's really monotonous, uncomfortable, and your one daily, absorbing, obsessive concern is hunger."

He asks me why I am not a revolutionary like other Latin American writers—Garcia Márquez, for example, or Julio Cortázar. I try to explain, but he doesn't seem particularly convinced by my conviction that without freedom all social reforms are bound to fail sooner or later. He says that Fidel Castro, who spent three days in Nicaragua for Daniel Ortega's inauguration, told him that in spite of my criticisms of Cuba, he wanted to meet me but wasn't able to find me. "Your police must be terrible," I tell him, laughing.

He assures me they are enormously efficient. "We've infiltrated the contras; we know all their moves and catch them like rabbits. I've even infiltrated the C.I.A. We don't use torture, so our only option is to be very good cops."

Toward the middle of January, Borge gives a dinner in my honor at his house. It is one of the few chances I have to talk with Nicaraguan writers. I discover that Nicaragua is like the rest of the world. Writers don't discuss literature when they get together: They talk about other writers who aren't there, and they talk politics. There are about 25 poets and novelists at the dinner, including Ernesto Cardenal. Minister of Culture, who is an excellent poet. I have attacked him for some of his outrageous demagogic statements, but every time we meet he is very cordial and suave, acting as if he knows nothing about what I have said about him.

Borge denies the insistent rumors that over and above his ideological differences with Commander Jaime Wheelock (Borge is radical and Wheelock is moderate) they despise each other. He also insists it is not true that relations between himself and Daniel Ortega are strained because Borge wants to be President. "Revolutions are invincible," he says, "unless they commit suicide by becoming divided, which was the case in Grenada, where Maurice Bishop was murdered by his own comrades. If we were disunited, the United States would invade immediately."

Borge's claim that prisoners are not tortured is disputed by Dr. Lino Hernández Triguero of the Permanent Commission on Human Rights. "We have proof," Hernández tells me, "of tortures that leave no mark. Prisoners are locked inside a dark cell for two or three months, for example. In the case of Dr. Alejandro Pereira, a political prisoner, Borge's men made him listen to a tape of his wife's voice pleading with him to confess to the charges against him."

How many political prisoners are there in Nicaragua? There are conflicting statistics. According to Borge, of the country's 6,000 prisoners, 2,000 are Somoza's ex-guards and about 200 are contras. According to the opposition the number is much higher. Enrique Sotelo Borgen, a Conservative representative in the National Assembly, estimates that there are about 10,000 political prisoners.

Many of the prisoners accused of being counterrevolutionaries are in the Zona Franca prison where, according to the Commission on Human Rights, there are at least "1,000 political prisoners in filthy and inhumanly overcrowded cells." The prisoners are allowed one visit every two months from one family member for one hour. The visitors start lining up at the prison gate the night before. I ask Borge for permission to visit Zona Franca; although he promises he will send it, I never receive the permit.

At our last meeting, Borge takes me to one of the prides of his ministry: the "open farms." At one, 14 miles from Managua, there are 59 prisoners—all former Somocista guards—who plant corn, beans and other food products on a 125-acre farm. There is no security of any kind, and the farm is run by a prisoners' council whose president, a former sergeant sentenced to 29 years in prison, was Somoza's bodyguard. They have visitors every Sunday, and every six months they can spend a week with their families. The farm has two rooms set aside for "conjugal meetings." According to Borge, there are seven "open farms" with a total of 900 prisoners, who are chosen on the basis of good behavior.

At the beginning of our visit to the farm, a former lieutenant in the guards who has six months left to serve asks Borge for an early pardon. Borge makes this proposal to the prisoners: I'll let him out if you promise not to ask me to shorten all of your sentences." They agree. But at the end of the visit an offical comes to Borge with the case of another prisoner who signed into Somoza's guard when he was 14 years old. He has been sentenced to 10 years in prison, and has already served five. His behavior has always been exemplary. Borge calls the prisoner over and asks him what he would do if he were free. "I'd finish school and then I'd study medicine," Borge cuts the five years off his sentence and gives orders for his immediate release. The young man begins to cry. The cameras of the state-controlled television, which accompany Borge on his tours, record it all.

THE POPULARITY OF THE REGIME DWINDLES

The Sandinistas boast of having received 67 percent of the vote in the recent elections, but the organizational structures in Nicaraguan society make it difficult to determine if the figure is a real reflection of the regime's popularity.

The Cuban-style Sandinista Defense Committees organize the populace by street and district. Anyone who does not belong is an outcast, since it is through these committees that one receives the coupons to buy rationed and subsidized basic commodities. The committees also grant the certificates of good conduct required for obtaining passports, state jobs or student scholarships.

The committees have made a valuable contribution to the campaigns for literacy and mass vaccinations, and they played an important role in the success of police operations against crime and drug traffic. In Managua, there is no drug problem among the young. It is safe to walk through any neighborhood, day or night, and the American Ambassador has only one bodyguard in contrast to the six needed by his counterpart in Costa Rica and the eight in San Salvador. The chief function of the defense committees, however, is to spy on neighbors.

Besides these committees, other mass Sandinista organizations include the official unions, which have not replaced the independents but have reduced and marginalized them, and the People's Army, which now has compulsory military service.

Although it is obvious that most of the population take part in these organizations, it is also obvious that participation is often grudging because it is unavoidable. Two days after my arrival, I spend a morning in Nagarote, 26 miles to the west of Managua.

About a week earlier, army recruiters—soldiers themselves—came to the village at dawn and battered down doors in their search for deserters and draft dodgers. The villagers reacted violently, fighting with fists and stones while someone rang the church bells to alert those who were still asleep. The recruiters retreated, but they came back with "turbas" armed with truncheons. In the meantime, the villagers had torn up the paving stones and built barricades in the streets. Nagarote was ified until midnight, after many villagers had been wounded or arrested.

The dozen or so women who tell me the story in the village church, where thrushes fly around the naves, are angry and frightened. "They say they'll be back tonight to take the girls away, too. They take away boys we've worked so hard to raise just to have them die like dogs." The women also complain about shortages, high prices, long lines and poor transportation. (The state-controlled transportation system is awful: One day in Managua I waited on line for an hour and a quarter for a bus, and once I got inside I thought I would die of asphyxiation.)

Three weeks later, I see 50 women, humble women like the ones from Nagarote, in the hallways of Archbishop Obando's house. They are there to tell Monsignor Obando about a similar though less-violent incident in a Managua shantytown. The roundups by the recruiters in movie houses, buses and sports stadiums is a topic that follows me around Nicaragua.

On the Atlantic coast, while I am waiting for a boat on the Bluefields dock, I hear two officials talking about "the kids who've gone to live in the woods to escape patriotic military service." And in a Managua seminary, two young seminarians—who were rounded up themselves as they were walking along the street, and who were later released—tell me about the boys who waited for a red light, disarmed the guards in the truck that was taking them away, and then escaped. For much the same reason that many American youths evaded the draft during the Vietnam War—to avoid getting killed—many Nicaraguan youths prefer to go into hiding rather than serve the two years in the army fighting the contras.

The explanation for the Government's recourse to a military draft, imposed in January 1984, that is so openly despised by so many people is that the war against the rebels leaves them no alternative. "It's not only a question of mobilization at the front," Vice President Ramirez tells me. "Many of the personnel protect public buildings and production centers threatened by sabotage."

More than 35,000 young men are believed to have been called up. In the countryside, youths as young as 14 and 15, who have no papers on them, have been rounded up. According to the Sandinistas, recruits receive a three-month training program before they are sent out to fight. The families of such youths, as well as opposition members, say that soldiers are sent out after a week's training, if that.

Nonetheless, it would be wrong to assume that anger at Sandinista policies means that every Nicaraguan who complains is an enemy of the regime. Every one of the enraged women in Nagarote voted for the Sandinista Front. Says one of them: "I pray that with President Ortega's help, things will get better."

The war, contra sabotage, the Government's totalitarian measures, a weakening economy—all of these factors have cooled the once almost-universal support for the regime. However, broad segments of the population, especially the poor, still favor the Government.

They have received concrete benefits from the revolution in the areas of health, education and land distribution, even though statist policies, combined with the worsening economy, have often impeded these reforms. All Nicaraguans have access to hospital care, for example, but the hospitals usually have no medicines to give them. Lowering the cost of basic food products through subsidies has caused a decline in agricultural production because it is cheaper for the peasant to buy food in staterun stores than to plant it.

But the egalitarian impulse that motivated the reforms, the desire to make amends to those Nicaraguans who had suffered neglect and abuse for centuries, still holds immense persuasive power. Even Arturo Jos Cruz, a leader of the Democratic Coordinator, the civilian opposition coalition, and the person least likely to be impartial about the regime, recognizes this.

He is in Managua for a few days, and I meet with him in a small house in Altos de Santo Domingo. Cruz, who now lives in Washington, is the best-known opposition figure abroad. An elegant intellectual, Cruz became the president of the Central Bank soon after the revolution and was his Government's Ambassador to Washington before he broke with the Sandinistas. I ask him if any good has come out of the revolution.

"Agrarian reform is a carefully conceived plan," he replies, "and the literacy campaign, rural development, the improved status of women—they are all positive. But their most important achievements is that they have broken down the tremendous class barriers that once divided society. The Sandinistas' mistake is thinking that none of these accomplishments is compatible with freedom."

A VISIT TO ORTEGA'S HOME

It often happens in revolutions. Before their triumph, the dynamic power of their call is centered on the libertarian impluse—hatred of the tryrant, of repression, of censorship. Once in power, however, egalitarianism takes control, and conflict between the two impluses is inevitable. This has happened in Nicaragua.

Tragically, liberty and equality are harsh antagonists. At the heels of a revolution, there is a temptation to establish social justice by sacrificing individual freedom; conversely, a desire to safeguard liberty can lead to further exploitation and unspeakable inequality. Real progress depends on achieving a tense equilibrium between the two ideals. No socialist revolution has yet achieved that balance.

The Nicaraguan revolutionaries who took power after a gallant struggle against a dynastic dictatorship believed they were free to distribute land, guarantee full employment, develop industry, lower the cost of food and transportation, end inequality, eradicate imperialism and aid neighboring countries in their own revolutionary struggles.

Five and a half years later, they are beginning to discover that transforming a society is far more difficult than setting up ambushes, attacking barracks or robbing banks. Furthermore, Marxist-Leninist slogans are no panacea for the brutal conditions of underdevelopment, the broad diversity of human responses and behavior, and the limitations placed on the sovereignty of poor, small nations when they become pawns in the rivalry between superpowers.

In my conversations with Sandinista leaders, they appear to be gradually learning the bourgeois art of compromise. Of the nine members of the Directorate, the one who is reputed to have learned it best is 39-year-old Commander Daniel Ortega.

I am told that Violeta Chamorro has called him "the best of all of them." He is also the quietest—a tough, somber man who seldom smiles. I accompany him on a tour of the northern front where he visits war widows and orphans, as well as soldiers wounded in contra ambushes—youths of 15, 16, 18 years of age with ruined faces, hands, legs. Throughout, his expression of cold solemnity never waivers.

On my last day in Nicaragua, he invites me to lunch with his wife, Rosario Murillo, at their comfortable home (the house of a banker who went into exile) in a well-to-do neighborhood of Managua. Rosario Murillo is a slender, warm woman who is a poet and a representative in the National Assembly. Their seven children, several from their previous marriages, live with them.

Daniel Ortega doesn't drink or smoke; he runs 3 miles and works 15 hours a day. He began to conspire against Somoza when he was 13 years old, and he spent seven years in prison for robbing a bank to obtain funds for the revolution. Although the nine Commanders assert emphatically that they are absolute equals, Commander Ortega, in fact, has been emerging as a leader, first as Coordinator of the Governing Junta and now as President.

I tell him that my month in his country has been a schizophrenic but privileged time for me. Every day, I speak alternately with Sandinistas and the opposition who, from one hour to the next, offer me the most contradictory versions of the same facts. I say I am alarmed by the mutual deafness between the regime and the dissidents.

"We'll get to understand one another gradually," he assures me. "We've already begun a dialogue with the bishops. And now that the Assembly is beginning to discuss the Constitution, we'll reopen the dialogue with the parties that boycotted the elections. Perhaps it will go slowly, but our internal tensions will be resolved. That's not the hard part. The hard part is negotiation with the United States. There's the root of all our problems. President Reagan has not renounced the idea of destroying us. He seems to negotiate, but then he pulls back. . . . He doesn't want to negotiate. He wants us to surrender.

"We've said that we're willing to send home the Cubans, the Russians, the rest of the advisers. We're willing to stop the movement of military aid, or any other kind of aid, through Nicaragua to El Salvador, and we're willing to accept international verification. In return, we're asking for only one thing: that they don't attack us, that the United States stop arming and financing . . . the gangs that kill our people, burn our crops and force us to divert enormous human and economic resources into war when we desperately need them for development."

Rosario Murillo calls us to the table, and I do not have the chance to tell Ortega that in my opinion negotiations with the Reagan Administration seem the simpler of the Sandinistas' two major problems: the United States and the civilian opposition. When the United States Government realizes that the Sandinista regime will not be overthrown by the contras, and that a direct intervention would be catastrophic for the cause of democracy in Latin America, it will probably negotiate what are, in the long run, its greatest concerns: getting the Soviet Union and Cuba out of Nicaragua and cutting off aid to the Salvadoran rebels. I have no doubt that Commander Ortega and his colleagues will grant that in exchange for peace.

What they won't grant so readily is what the domestic opposition wants: full democracy and power sharing. Unfortunately, they are loyal to an old Latin American tradition, one that they share with a good number of their adversaries. They believe, although they don't admit it, that real legitimacy resides in the weapons that enable you to take power, and that once you have power, there is no reason to share it.

That is why it is so difficult for the regime to reach an understanding with an opposition that tends to back itself into an all-or-nothing position. And yet the survival of the Sandinista revolution depends on negotiation, agreement—or at least accommodation—with its opponents. Perhaps that is not the ideal solution for those of us who still support the "forms" of democracy, but it is worth every effort to promote social justice within a system that is at least minimally pluralist, to fend off the suffocating despair and injustices endemic to Marxist dictatorships.

One night, in Nicaragua, Don Emilio, the old conservative and political analyst, tells me this: "Our native Latin American culture is all powerful. It swallows up everything you give it. It assimilates everything and eventually puts its own stamp on it." I think to myself that is exactly what Rubén Darío did, that obscure Nicaraguan who starting out imitating the French symbolists at the end of the 19th century and ended up revolutionizing poetry in the Spanish language.

Will Latin American culture swallow up the impatient Marxism of the Sandinistas and turn into something else, something better? The circumstances are auspicious.●

THE FREEDOM OF CHOICE HEALTH MAINTENANCE ORGANIZATION: A PROMISING ALTERNATIVE FOR MEDICARE BENEFICIARIES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today which I believe will offer the promise of providing more benefits to older Americans while at the same time reducing Medicare costs. This legislation, which I will refer to as the "freedom-of-choice Health Maintenance Organization [HMO] demonstration," also addresses a concern many older Americans have regarding enrollment in a health maintenance organization—that is, the loss of the right to receive health services from one's current physician.

A brief explanation regarding prepaid Medicare health maintenance organizations would be helpful at this point, Mr. Speaker. Recently, the Health Care Financing Administration [HCFA] of the Department of Health and Human Services conducted a series of prepaid Medicare demonstration programs throughout the country under which health maintenance organizations and similar organizations were paid by HCFA, the agency which administers the Medicare Program, at the rate of 95 percent of the average cost for caring for a Medicare patient, or less, for providing Medicare services to enrolled Medicare beneficiaries. This was a prospective payment system that was not adjusted retroactively; all profits or surpluses were retained by the HMO, and all losses were the responsibility of the HMO.

In order to encourage Medicare beneficiaries to enroll in their demonstration programs, some of the participating HMO's developed extremely comprehensive benefit packages for Medicare enrollees. In some cases, Medicare enrollees paid nothing to join the HMO and received extra benefits, such as elimination of the Medicare deductibles and copayments, free prescription drugs, free eyeglasses and hearing aids, unlimited acute care hospitalization, routine eye and hearing examinations, routine foot care, routine physical examinations, and a broad range of dental services.

In February 1985, the Department of Health and Human Services initiated a program to expand the use of HMO's by Medicare beneficiaries. This new program differs from most previous HMO-type Medicare arrangements in two respects. First, the new program puts HMO's at risk because they are paid a fixed per-patient fee or capitation payment to provide all covered services. The capitation payment is to be based on the average Medicare costs for all beneficiaries in each HMO's service area. Second, enrolled beneficiaries are required to obtain all their health care, except emergency or urgently needed services, from the HMO unless authorized by the HMO to obtain services elsewhere. This is known as the "lock-in" feature, and any services obtained by beneficiaries without the HMO's authorization are referred to as "out-of-plan." Neither the HMO nor Medicare is obligated to pay for unauthorized, nonemergency services received from the nonplan providers; the beneficiaries are personally liable.

The key feature of the freedom-of-choice HMO at-risk concept, which I am introducing today, is the elimination of the restrictive HMO "lock in" provisions that have hindered the attractiveness of HMO's to potential enrollees and, hence, the growth of HMO's. Specifically, beneficiaries enrolled in the freedom-of-choice HMO demonstrations will retain the right to receive their health services through any qualified Medicare provider, without referral or authorization by the HMO, exactly as they do at the present time. However, HMO's which will be paid by HCFA at the rate of 95 percent of the average cost for caring for a Medicare patient, will be at risk financially to pay the same amount as Medicare would pay for Medicare covered services not provided directly through the HMO. Also, beneficiaries using Medicare covered services not provided directly through the HMO will continue to be responsible for Medicare deductible and coinsurance amounts and will continue to be subject to all Medicare limits on services.

After HCFA assigns financial risk for Medicare beneficiaries to a freedom-of-choice HMO demonstration, enrolled beneficiaries will have, continuously, the option of receiving any or all of their health services directly through the HMO. Indeed, the HMO will attempt to induce beneficiaries to use services provided directly through the HMO by reducing or eliminating the Medicare deductible and coinsurance amounts and by providing more comprehensive benefits, including benefits for services that are not covered by the regular Medicare program, for enrollees receiving their services directly through the HMO. Moreover, in order to induce enrollees to use services provided directly through the HMO, the HMO could make certain extra benefits, such as prescription drugs and eyeglasses, available to Medicare beneficiaries who receive all of their health services directly through the HMO for a specified period of time.

Under the freedom-of-choice option, HMO's will have the right to fulfill the Medicare intermediary and carrier functions themselves or to use existing intermediaries and carriers. In the latter case, the HMO will fulfill the claims review function.

In order to eliminate the need for costly HMO marketing efforts, large numbers of Medicare beneficiaries in demonstration areas will be assigned randomly to participating HMO's. Random assignment will be acceptable, because assigned beneficiaries still will be able to receive their Medicare-covered services in the same manner and from the same providers as at the present time.

In areas with more than one participating HMO, beneficiaries assigned to a particular HMO will be permitted to request reassignment to another HMO.

Demonstration HMO's will exercise stringent claims review vis-a-vis non-HMO services and will offer strong incentives for beneficiary use of HMO services while preserving continuous beneficiary freedom-of-choice of providers.

It is anticipated that freedom-of-choice HMO's will stimulate HMO expansion by providing large enrollment bases of Medicare beneficiaries. Moreover, the demonstrations will pose a more significant "threat" than traditional HMO's to the patient bases of non-HMO providers, which may stimulate more providers to affiliate with HMO's.

It is interesting to note that the freedom-of-choice HMO concept is just as applicable in commercial markets as it is in the Medicare market.

In sum, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the freedom-of-choice HMO's will provide more benefits to enrolled beneficiaries while saving HCFA 5 percent, providing continuous freedom-of-choice for beneficiaries to use non-HMO providers exactly as they do at the present time, and meet many of the service delivery problems currently facing older Americans.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this important legislation, which I ask be inserted in its entirety at this point in this RECORD:

H.R.—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Secretary of Health and Human Services (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") shall provide for medicare demonstration projects in accordance with this Act in not fewer than four States.

(b) Under such a demonstration project—

(1) the Secretary would contract with one or more eligible organizations (described in section 1876(b) of the Social Security Act) to perform the functions both of intermediaries under part A of such Act and of carriers under part B of such Act with respect to benefits furnished in a State (or portion thereof), except that in the case of benefits for services not furnished directly by the organization, payment for the benefits would be made by the existing intermediaries and carriers with the organization merely responsible for the exclusive determination of whether or not payment can be made consistent with paragraphs (1) and (9) of section 1862(a) of such Act;

(2) if the Secretary contracts with one such organization serving an area, the Secretary must permit any other such organization serving that area to enter into such a contract;

(3) individuals residing in the State (or portion thereof) covered by the project and entitled or enrolled for benefits under part A or part B of title XVIII of such Act—

(A) would be required to enroll with one of such organizations participating in the project, but

(B) may elect to receive any covered service directly from the organization or through any other qualified medicare provider;

(4) each organization may offer benefits, at no additional cost to beneficiaries, in addition to those otherwise available under such title;

NASA CENTERS FOR THE COMMERCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF SPACE

(Mr. NELSON of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I want to share with you a new and exciting program in the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. It has been initiated to further the commercial use of space.

This year NASA formally invited U.S. industry, universities and other nonprofit corporations to submit proposals for the establishment of centers for the commercial development of space. As we look into the future of our manned space activities we are going to see a whole new array of commercial enterprises start to develop.

We are going to see, as a result of the establishment of the permanently manned space station, new industries, new industrial activities, new pharmaceutical manufacturing activities in space. And to get ready for that we are now creating within NASA these centers for commercial development of space.

The objective of these centers will be to stimulate high technology research directed at the development of new products in space which have commercial potential

NASA plans to establish such centers, perhaps three or as many as six centers in 1986. And each center will be a collaborative effort between industry and/or research institutions such as universities.

NASA will start out with initial funding for these centers and will make available Government facilities and flight opportunities and other services for conducting experiments.

Research areas that have promising commercial potential might be such as electronic materials manufacturing; that is, semiconductors. It could be containerless processing of glass and other new space technologies.

Thus far, the RFP that NASA has sent out has generated quite a few letters of interest from business and academic organizations interested in establishing such a center for the commercial development of space.

The amount of interest that has been shown in the private sector clearly demonstrates the value of using innovative approaches to further this country's long-range objective to commercialize space.

I applaud this NASA initiative and, as the chairman of the Space Committee of this body it is my privilege to bring this new, exciting endeavor to the attention of the Members.

SENSE OF CONGRESS THAT SOCIAL SECURITY COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS SHOULD NOT BE REDUCED OR ELIMINATED

(Mr. KANJORSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, yesterday an overwhelming bipartisan coalition in the other body sent a strong message to out Nation's senior citizens that it would not tamper with their Social Security cost-of-living adjustments.

Projections by the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare indicate that the proposed "diet COLA" would push the average retired worker under the poverty line by 1988. Benefit reductions in Social Security and Medicare would cost the average retiree $1,778 over the next 5 years.

Next year alone senior citizens in my congressional district in northeastern Pennsylvania would lose nearly $11 million in income.

It is time for the House to send its own message to our senior citizens that their benefits are safe by cosponsoring, and passing House Concurrent Resolution 116, bipartisan legislation I have introduced expressing the sense of the Congress that Social Security cost-of-living adjustments should not be reduced or eliminated.

H. CON. RES. 116

Whereas more than thirty-six million Americans depend upon Social Security for their livelihood;

Whereas Social Security benefits are provided through a trust fund separate from general revenues;

Whereas the Social Security trust fund is supported entirely by contributions from employees and their employers;

Whereas the 1985 annual report of the Board of Trustees of the Social Security trust fund concludes that the assets of the trust fund are sufficient to pay benefits "well into the next century";

Whereas Social Security is a fully funded insurance program and not a welfare program;

Whereas Social Security recipients have already made major sacrifices as a result of the passage of the 1983 Social Security Amendments in order to restore the solvency of the Social Security trust fund;

Whereas these sacrifices already include the elimination of the minimum benefit, the taxation of one-half of many recipients' benefits and a six-month delay in COLA's;

Whereas Social Security cuts already enacted into law will cost retired and disabled persons $100 billion by the end of the decade;

Whereas the average income of Social Security recipients is substantially below the average income for the population as a whole;

Whereas automatic COLA increases have reduced by more than 40% the percentage of senior citizens with incomes below the poverty level;

Whereas a freeze on COLA's could push more than a half a million Americans under the poverty line next year, and as many as 2.3 million by 1990;

Whereas proposals are being considered by the administration and in the Congress to either eliminate or reduce Social Security cost-of-living adjustments; and

Whereas any reduction in benefits would impose a substantial hardship on millions of senior citizens which is unnecessary because the Social Security system is sound and solvent: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that Social Security cost-of-living adjustments (COLA's) should not be reduced or eliminated.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take my special order out of order at this time. I have discussed this with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROSE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FRANK). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. ROSE. Reserving the right to object, and I will not object, will the gentleman indicate to me how long he thinks he will speak under his special order?

Mr. GILMAN. My remarks will be very brief, as I am sure will those of the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROSE. I do not object.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

SOLIDARITY SUNDAY FOR SOVIET JEWRY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I requested this special order today in order to highlight the important activities that will be taking place this coming Sunday in New York City. On May 5, 1985, the 14th Annual Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry will be held opposite the United Nations at Dag Hammarskjold Plaza, for which over 100,000 participants are expected.

Among the speakers at the Solidarity Sunday rally will be Elie Wiesel, who has for years been a catalyst in the Soviet Jewry movement, and Avital Shcharansky, wife of the long-term prisoner of conscience, Anatoly Shcharansky. Anatoly remains incarcerated, in ill health, with another 5 years left to serve in a prison sentence that charged him with treason. Since the day of his initial arrest, Avital Shcharansky has been a tireless spokesperson for him and other prisoners of conscience and refuseniks. She continues to travel across the country to enlist support for these efforts, and has become a thorn in the sides of Soviet authorities who most assuredly did not anticipate the stubborn resolve with which she has fought for her husband's freedom these many years.

This year particularly, we find ourselves in a state of flux regarding Soviet Jewish emigration. Since 1979, when over 51,000 men, women, and children were allowed to emigrate to freedom, the numbers of those allowed to emigrate to Israel has steadily declined. Two years ago we were shocked when only about 1,300 were allowed to leave. Last year, that number dipped below 900. Arrests and harassment of refuseniks have increased. Hebrew teachers have been convicted on fabricated drug and ammunitions possessions charges. There are now 22 Prisoners of Conscience, among them Iosef Begun, who is in the midst of a 12-year prison sentence.

In addition, we must now contend with Mikhael Gorbachev, the new Soviet leader, and gauge whether or not Soviet Jewish emigration is a subject on which we can convince them to change their present policy.

It is because the issue of Soviet Jewry is such a clear one, that the United States and other nations of the Western World continue to speak out on their behalf. We have endeavored to make this commitment known to the Soviet authorities at every opportunity. Yet they continue to contend that human rights are an internal matter.

Yesterday, May 1, 1985, was celebrated in the Communist world as a holiday. Twenty-five Washington area rabbis took that opportunity to protest Soviet oppression, and were joined in major cities around the country by their colleagues. All were arrested at various Soviet embassies and consulates in our Nation. This kind of civil demonstration on the part of the rabbinic community is a new tactic, one which would not have been endorsed had the situation not needed drastic measures.

The situation in the Soviet Union today is that precarious. Innocent men and women suffer the harangues of extensive KGB searches of their homes, their confiscation of property, KGB officers following them every time they attempt to leave their apartments, prolonged interrogations at police headquarters, threats of job dismissal followed by threats of arrest for being a parasite. Crudely produced films are being shown on Soviet television depicting the "Zionist agents" whose sole offense is wanting to practice their faith freely. Disruption of mail to the Soviet Union continues, despite actions of protest taken by the Universal Postal Union. Arrests have now escalated to include criminal charges of drug and weapons possession, violations that were previously not utilized to silence the Soviet Jewry movement.

In recognition that religious and cultural freedom for Soviet Jews remains a priority of the American people, Solidarity Sunday continues to be an important vehicle for focusing world attention on their plight. The list of refuseniks who continue to wait for emigration vizovs includes Ilya Essas, Ida Nudel, Mark Nashpitz, the Goldshtein brothers, and so many others that there is not enough time to read all their names.

As we prepare to mark Solidarity Sunday, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank those colleagues who cosponsored House Resolution 127, which I was pleased to sponsor along with my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL], and which expresses congressional support for this event. It is only through our mutual efforts and those of all freedom loving people that we can hope to eventually see Soviet Jews living in religious and cultural freedom.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I thank the gentleman [Mr. GILMAN] for taking out this special order on Solidarity Sunday.

We have had the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to travel to the Soviet Union together and to meet with some of the people who are suffering this religious and political persecution in the Soviet Union, and we both came away amazed at the sad plight but also the great spiritedness, the hope that they project because we have not forgotten them.

Every Member who has adopted somebody in the Soviet Union who is a political prisoner or is being persecuted does something very significant. I remember when we went, one holy day, to meet in front of the Jewish synagog which had been politicized so that the people refused to go inside, and they were only meeting in the street, but the people who were not Jewish who came to that rallying point on that Soviet sidestreet to meet in front of that synagogue and to nurture one another and to share one another's suffering. But there was this tremendous spirit of good will among them and it was so emboldened by the fact that we in the Congress would even do a simple little thing like write to them.

I remember saying, "Doesn't this get you in trouble with the CIA?" They look at all the mail. "Doesn't it get you interrogated?" They said "Oh, yes. We may be hassled, we may be called down to the KGB headquarters on Derszinsky Square, they may be angry that U.S. Congressmen and women are writing to us, but we will not disappear. We will not be just dragged off to some gulag in Siberia never to be heard from again."

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to my colleagues who are not fully apprised of this issue to join with us who have already adopted and write to Soviet, both Jewish and Pentacostal dissidents. If five letters arrive in any given week from five different Members to any one of these people, I will give you their own works again. It not only gives them hope that they are not forgotten, but it makes them aware that they will never be dragged off to die in some forgotten gulag camp.

So the more we can do to show solidarity with these people who seem to be forced to live through a dark page of history from the 1930's that we thought we had left behind us, the more we can do to establish a brotherhood or sisterhood with them, the more we protect them. This is going to be a bleak period for the next few years because I remember when one of the politburo members came as a Soviet delegation in March and met with many Members over in the Longworth Building, I remember when one of them left and turned to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] and said, "You do yourself and your people," and I assume he was referring to Jews around the world, "you do yourself no good. This is our internal problem." And was his final line not: "It is a closed book"? Were those his exact words?

Mr. GILMAN. Well, more particularly, that "Your continual insistence on human rights keeps a division between our two nations."

Mr. DORNAN of California. Between the Soviet Union and the United States?

Mr. GILMAN. Yes.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Then he said, "It is a closed book."

Mr. GILMAN. Yes.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Well, it is not a closed book. Injustice is never a closed book.

Mr. Speaker, I just close again by repeating what those longsuffering but courageous people have told us personally in Leningrad, Kiev, Moscow, Riga, everyplace that we met with them: "Don't forget us, please write to us." That is not very much to ask.

Mr. GILMAN. I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] for his supportive comments, for he has been a longtime crusader for human rights. He has been particularly supportive of the issue of Soviet Jewry. I recall when we were in the Kremlin and met with the Chief Justice of the Soviet Union, Mr. Smirnov, and the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] showed him his bracelet that he had been wearing and which he had helped to distribute on behalf of Anatoly Shcharansky, and I recall then that the Chief Justice turned to us and said: "Congressmen, you may not have read our white paper on these kinds of cases, but it is my contention that human rights is a propaganda vehicle of the West." Again I want to thank the gentleman for his supportive statements.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILMAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DORNAN of California. I just want to describe that, and then we will yield back the time to the gentleman who so graciously let us go ahead of him.

Mr. Speaker, that was one of the proudest moments I ever had, serving as a U.S. Congressman. All of the Members were proud, on that trip, to wear a Shcharansky bracelet. I remember some had Josef Begoun's name on their bracelets.

When a woman shows a bracelet, she tends to graciously just sort of extend her hand and show you the bracelet, but when a man shows a bracelet, he just has a tendency to close his hand a bit and hold the bracelet up this way.

I remember sitting there, right there in the heart of the Kremlin with this Supreme Court Justice across from me and the Labor Minister was there, there were some very high-ranking Soviet officials, and I said, "Sir, we are all wearing remembrance bracelets. We will not forget Anatole Shcharansky and the others."

I motioned to the rest of our delegation; I believe we had an even 10—5 Republicans, 5 Democratic Members—all of them sort of spontaneously put up their hands like this with their bracelet on it, and, not that we were making fists, but it was like 10 solidarity hands raised saying, "We will not forget." It sort of physically stunned the Soviets. They couldn't believe that we would care about citizens that they have forced into a downtrodden position in their society.

The more we do this, the more we crack through that mindset of theirs, we simply are not going to forget that people are being persecuted for religious and political reasons in that large superpower. The book is far from closed.

Mr. GILMAN. That is an appropriate remark to close our special order, because that is what Solidarity Sunday is all about. We will not forget, and it is a symbol for our Nation and the entire world.

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, May 5, 1985, over 100,000 will march in New York City in the 14th annual "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry." This rally is a significant demonstration of overwhelming support and sympathy for Soviet Jews who struggle for personal and religious freedom.

Those participating in Solidarity Sunday deserve a special tribute. Their dedicated efforts send a powerful message to those who are kept prisoners in their own country, forbidden the right to practice their Jewish religion and denied the right to emigrate. It is vitally important to let these brave men and women know they are not forgotten in their valiant fight for freedom.

One hundred thousand voices joined together in loud protest against Soviet policies of anti-Semitism is not likely to be overlooked by the Kremlin. Many may speculate that the new leadership under general Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev may ease restrictions on emigration. Yet the harassment and cruel sanctions against Soviet Jews continues.

Hebrew teachers are arrested on fabricated charges. Prisoners of conscience and refuseniks, such as Ida Nudel and Lev Elbert, endure vicious slander and threats. Still others suffer the harsh conditions of Soviet prison camps; some are institutionalized in Soviet psychiatric hospitals, their minds and bodies subjected to injections of dangerous drugs; some are exiled, forbidden from contact with family and friends. So many Soviet Jews endure suffering few of us can comprehend. Yet, they keep fighting.

In this context, it is my prayer that this year's march for Soviet Jewry will be even more successful than last year's and will increase public awareness to the very serious anti-Semitic violence encouraged by the Soviet regime.

This is the goal of Solidarity Sunday. Our voices joined together will help each and every Soviet Jew knows that he or she in not forgotten. Our unity, our solidarity, with them in the spirit of human rights and religious freedom joins us in the prayerful belief that the day of freedom will come for all who seek it.●

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union has fallen drastically in the last 5 years, from 51,320 in 1979 to only 896 in 1984. The denial of religious freedom for Jews by Soviet authorities within the Soviet Union has intensified, including the arrests of many Hebrew teachers last summer. At the same time, the Soviets have virtually closed their borders to those Soviet Jews who would emigrate in order to worship.

It is for these reasons that the Honorable BENJAMIN GILMAN, my New York colleague, and I have joined to ask for this special order to address this issue and to express our support for the "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" rally near the United Nations.

The Helsinki Act of 1975, which the Soviet Union signed, binds the Soviet Union to various commitments, including respect for human rights, respect for fundamental freedoms, and cooperation in humanitarian fields. We have seen little respect for these human rights in the treatment of Soviet Jews.

The Soviet Union has not honored its human rights commitments under a number of other international agreements, such as the International Civil and Political Covenant, and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. These United Nations covenants guarantee the right to life, liberty, and security of person, the right to a fair and public hearing in criminal cases by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law, and the right to peaceful assembly.

Many of the major freedoms contained in these covenants have been violated in the oppression of Soviet Jews. Each has been flaunted by the Soviet Union in their treatment of minorities. Here we take religious freedom as the bedrock of our democracy, and in fact America has been known as a sanctuary of religious freedom since the first settlers joined native Americans here for the sole purpose of escaping religious persecution.

I recently traveled to the Soviet Union and met with Soviet leaders. When the issue of Soviet Jews was raised, the standard Soviet answer was simply that it is an internal issue. But the Soviets themselves are not treating emigration as an internal issue.

The Soviet Government is clearly trying the emigration of Soviet Jews to the state of overall United States-Soviet relations. A fiftyfold decrease in emigration by Soviet Jews will not foster détente, however, and the Soviets must realize that the issue of human rights cannot and must not be tied to other issues. Religious freedom is not a United States-Soviet issue. But what we can do and must do is to continue to speak out.

We must speak with a united voice to let the Soviet Union know that we are watching their treatment of Soviet Jews, and to tell them that we will continue to press for increased freedom of emigration in the Soviet Union. The Soviets must also realize that it is in their best interests to allow Soviet Jews to practice their faith openly and to teach their children as they wish. If the Soviet Union will not allow religious freedom, and will not open its borders, it should at least accord Jews the same limited freedom to practice as other religions now have, such as Moslems, Baptists, the Russian Orthodox, and Lutherans.

There are some 400,000 Soviet Jews now trying to emigrate. Several million more suffer discrimination and cannot practice their faith openly. The Soviet Jewish community is the third largest in the world, behind the United States and Israel. We must speak out more loudly as Soviet treatment of its Jewish citizens worsens. I hope you will join us in passing House Resolution 127, "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry."●

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join our colleagues from New York, Representatives RANGEL and GILMAN, in observing the 14th annual commemoration of Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry which will take place on May 5. This annual event, which draws thousands of concerned individuals—Jews and non-Jews alike—is a vivid expression of the deep and abiding concern we in the United States have for the Jewish minority in the Soviet Union.

As the emigration rates for Soviet Jews remain at the lowest levels ever, as anti-Semitism continues to be official state policy in the U.S.S.R., as over 20 Jewish prisoners of conscience languish in Soviet prisons and labor camps, and as thousands of would-be emigrants are forcibly separated from their relatives and loved ones, it is essential that Americans step up their efforts to draw the glare of international public opinion onto this tragic situation. The mass demonstration in New York City this Sunday protesting the inhumane treatment of Soviet Jews is an important manifestation of determination and dedication to this cause. I commend the organizers of Solidarity Sunday for their good hard work and I lend my full support to this struggle.●

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, this Sunday, the Coalition to Free Soviet Jews will be holding its 14 annual commemoration of "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry," and I rise to join with my colleagues in the House of Representatives to join hands with the thousands of people who will gather in New York City, in solidarity with the millions of Jews in the Soviet Union, who are being held hostage by the Communists.

As we are all well aware, in recent months arrests, harassment, and officially sanctioned anti-Semitism have increased by the Communists, and emigration has fallen off significantly, as the Communists have moved toward sealing shut the emigration door. We in Congress must condemn the Communists' conduct in the strongest possible terms for violating international obligations to which the Soviet Union has agreed as a signator of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Convenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the Helsinki Final Act.

Today, nearly 400,000 Jews, who have indicated their desire to emigrate to Isreal and practice their religion in freedom, are brutally mistreated by the Communists. Despite constant acts of cruelty, prisoners of conscience and refuseniks have remained steadfast to their ideas. These brave men and women have become a symbol of strength and a source of inspiration for hundreds of thousands of Jews in the Soviet Union, and indeed for all people throughout the world trying to escape the yoke of Communist tyranny and oppression.

Mr. Speaker, on this 14th anniversary of "Solidarity Sunday," let us continue to pledge to do everything in our power to pressure the Soviets to allow Jews to practice their religion and to emigrate from the Soviet Union without fear of reprisal, and let us hope and pray that human rights violations against Soviet Jews cease.●

● Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I would first like to thank the gentlemen from New York, Messrs. GILMAN and RANGEL, for requesting this special order on behalf of the Soviet Jewry. As my colleagues know, I do not cosponsor commemorative legislation, but I fully support their efforts to focus our Nation's attention on the plight of the Jews in Russia, and Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I find myself standing here once again.

We all hope and pray that each plea to the Soviet Union to live up to its international obligations will be accepted and therefore be the last.

We all hope and pray that the Soviets finally will respect the right of its people to worship and travel and emigrate freely.

We all hope and pray that the Soviet Union will respect the inviolability of the international postal system.

We all hope and pray that the Soviet Government will work actively to halt, not encourage, the increasingly frequent anti-Semitic acts in Russia.

Alas, we all know that these hopes and prayers are unlikely to be met in the short term and without constant pressure from around the world. We all know too that we have a moral obligation to continue that pressure, to continue to fight for the inalienable rights of the Soviet Jews.

Again, I thank my colleagues for calling this special order, and I sincerely hope that Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry is a success.●

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate with my colleagues in this special order on behalf of the plight of Soviet Jews.

Today we are recognizing the more than 400,000 Jews who seek their moral and legal right to leave the Soviet Union in search of religious freedom and the ability to study their culture and history. We have witnessed a dramatic and tragic 95 percent drop in exit visas in the last few years, and the trend appears to be continuing. There are thousands of Soviet Jewish citizens who have been imprisoned for seeking their legal right to emigrate or for practicing their Jewish religion. Not only are those who desire to emigrate denied the opportunity, but many are prevented from even applying for emigration. Day in and day out the Government of the Soviet Union denies the rights of Jews and others to practice their faith, and subjects them to physical and psychological harassment, beatings, imprisonment, confinement in mental institutions, and the separation of family members.

We must not ignore the blatant abuse of human rights and freedoms perpetrated by the Soviet Government against its innocent citizens. We cannot turn our backs on those who suffer cruel persecution and oppression because they wish to practice their religion freely without fear in the land of their choice. It is important to bring to the attention of the Congress, the citizens of our Nation and, indeed, the world our deep concern over the plight of Soviet Jews. As Members of Congress it is our responsibility to maintain whatever pressure is required to force the Soviets to adhere to the Helsinki accords and to honor their obligations under the International Covenants on Human Rights.

I join my colleagues today in calling upon officials of the Soviet Government to abide by international human rights agreements which recognize the basic rights of human beings, and to remove the impediments to the free exercise of those rights by those of the Jewish faith in their country.●

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues from New York for arranging this special order in honor of Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry. Coinciding as it does with the 40th anniversary of the defeat of Nazi Germany, this year's observance could not have occurred at a more appropriate time.

One can scarcely pick up a newspaper or turn on the television or radio without encountering stories of the allied victory over fascism. The Soviet Union has approached this anniversary with great enthusiasm, and has eagerly sought joint celebrations with its wartime allies.

There is a cruel irony in the fact that it is now the Soviet Union that oppresses the very group that the Nazis singled out for extermination. Today it is the Soviet Union that prevents Jews from practicing their religion. It is the Soviet Union that harasses them, beats them, and imprisons them on trumped-up charges. It is the Soviet Union that engages in state-supported anti-Semitism and slanderously accuses Jews of using narcotics in their religious rituals. And it is the Soviet Union that has slowed emigration to a mere trickle and prevented Jews from escaping this repression.

Later this month, the signatories to the Helsinki accords will meet in Ottawa to discuss their compliance with the portions of that agreement that deal with human rights. Our delegation knows that it has the full support of the Congress and the American people in its struggle to assure the rights of people everywhere.●

● Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, this Sunday, May 5, the Coalition for Free Soviet Jews will hold its annual Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry rally. It is expected that more than 100,000 people will come to speak out on behalf of those who are not free to speak. I commend these dedicated individuals for their commitment to human rights for Soviet Jews, and for their recognition of the fact that we, as the leaders of the free world, cannot be silent in the face of religious oppression. Their example should motivate us all in our personal commitment to Soviet Jewry, and should remind us that year-round activism is essential in the struggle to free the Soviet Jews.

The situation for the Soviet Jews is as critical now as it has ever been. The statistics tell a grim story. Recent figures indicate that 97 Jews were allowed to emigrate in March of this year—a slight improvement over the same period in 1984 but still distressingly low. In fact, this year's statistics are remarkably similar to those of last year—a time when the total number of exit visas issued reached an all time low of 896.

Numbers alone, however, do not convey the desperate circumstances now facing Soviet Jews. The very existence of the refusenik community is increasingly jeopardized as the Soviet Government seeks to repress Jewish cultural life. The teaching of Hebrew is punishable by 7 years of hard labor and many teachers have been arrested. Expressing a desire to emigrate leads to the loss of one's job and the beginning of a life of persecution and hardship. It becomes more difficult every day for the refuseniks to hold onto their Jewish heritage. Now is clearly the time for action, and for a renewal of our commitment to human rights for Soviet Jews.

We are entering a critical period in United States-Soviet relations, and the issue of human rights merits special attention. The current situation, with new leadership in Moscow, offers a unique opportunity to effect real changes for Soviet Jews. The United States has a unique role; it, alone among all nations, can insist that those changes be made. This role brings with it an awesome responsibility—we who live in freedom are morally obligated to reach out to those who suffer from oppression and to do all that we can to secure their freedom.

I ask that you all join with me today in reaffirming our commitment to basic human rights and religious freedom for Soviet Jews.●

● Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, I commend the thousands and thousands of people who will be involved in Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry on May 5 who recognize that we cannot remain silent in the face of religious repression. Recently I had occasion to meet with a number of refuseniks in the Soviet Union and their families. Never has the situation of the denial of human rights been more vivid, more poignant to me. For all the reading, for all the stories you hear, to personally witness the courage of the people in the Soviet Union who are committed to cultural and religious freedom in the face of awesome retaliation is to feel your own commitment deepen to the principles of human dignity and freedom.

While on the recent trip to Soviet Union as part of the Speaker's delegation, I also had occasion, along with my colleague Representative MILLER, to meet with the first Deputy Minister of Internal Affairs for several hours to discuss human rights. I found these talks productive. I do know that it remains to be seen if the Soviets will make significant concessions in this area. I emphasized to them in our meeting, and will continue to do so in the future, that actions speak louder than words.

The Soviet Government must know that we take the denial of human rights seriously, we take this to heart. I emphasized to them in our meetings that this affects all other areas of mutual concern, be it trade or nuclear arms. This is where it must begin. Conscience, compassion, justice demand an end to human rights violations. And in supporting publicly the struggle of those in the Soviet Union dedicated to human rights, we support the cause of religious and cultural freedom throughout the world. Brave people in labor camps, in jail awaiting trials, those behind locked doors praying for loved ones must know that they are not forgotten.●

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of legislation which expresses congressional support for Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry, I am pleased and honored to participate in this special order.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, the Solidarity Sunday rally will be held on May 5 in New York City, at which more than 100,000 individuals will participate. This gathering has become the prominent gathering of the year for the expression of support for Soviet Jews. Equally as important, the rally will serve as a reminder to the Soviet Union that Americans will continue to strive for religious and cultural freedom throughout the world.

I think it only fitting at this time to bring to your attention Mr. Speaker, a resolution that was recently sent to me by the Jewish Federation of Central New Jersey. The board of directors of the federation have adopted two Hebrew teachers in the Soviet Union, pressing for their immediate release from Soviet labor camps. As a Member of the U.S. Congress, I appeal to the Soviet Union and all totalitarian regimes for the release of the oppressed. For these people, the United States of America remains the focal point for their dreams of liberty. They indeed see this country as the embodiment of the basic meaning of freedom.

Yuli Edelstein and Aleksandr Kholmainsky were two of the first Hebrew teachers arrested by Soviet authorities. Since their arrest, countless Hebrew teachers have been arrested in an attempt to eradicate all teaching of Hebrew, Jewish culture, and Jewish history in the Soviet Union. As a nation dedicated to the principles of independence and the protection of human rights, the oppressed look to us. We must provide leadership and guidance for their unyielding struggle.

I wish to thank my colleagues, Congressmen RANGEL and GILMAN for calling this special order today and join them in this tribute of strength to the Soviet Jews. As representatives of the free world, we cannot be complacent. It is our duty to publicly deplore all human rights violations against the people of all countries who live under an oppressive government that denies liberty and justice to its citizens.●

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join so many of my distinguished colleagues from both sides of the aisle in today's special order on Soviet Jewry. While I am encouraged by the large number of participants with us this afternoon and by the fact that more than 220 Members of this body have cosponsored House Resolution 127, a measure expressing congressional support for Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry, I find it disheartening that there continues to be a pressing need for us to engage in these actions.

It is a tragic irony that, as we observe the 40th anniversary of Europe's liberation from Hitler's awful tyranny, the Jews in the Soviet Union are subjected to an official campaign of harrassment, intimidation, and physical abuse not unlike Nazi policies of the 1930's. Recently, in Alert, the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews ran an article entitled "The Cultural Genocide Continues" which I would like to have inserted into my remarks at this point.

THE CULTURAL GENOCIDE CONTINUES

NAZI CONTROLLED EUROPE: 1930'S

Destruction of Jewish culture and religion.

U.S.S.R.: 1970'S TO NOW

The past year has been marked by an intensified anti-Semitic propanda campaign, harsh measures against Jews seeking to express their cultural and religious heritage, and the establishment of an Anti-Zionist Committee. There are under 60 synagogues for 2½ million Jews; the teaching of Hebrew, Judaica, or any kind of religious text is strictly prohibited; and no printing of a Hebrew bible or prayerbook has been authorized.

NAZI CONTROLLED EUROPE: 1930'S

Jews differentiated from other nationals.

U.S.S.R. 1970'S TO NOW

All Soviets are required to carry an internal passport at all times with their names, address, nationality, etc. Jew's internal passports have, as their nationality, "Ivrei" (Jew), immediately identifying them to employers, doctors, bureaucrats as members of the "hated race of Zionist traitors."

NAZI CONTROLLED EUROPE: 1930'S

Jews perceived as the internal enemy of the people.

U.S.S.R.: 1970'S TO NOW

March, 1983: Russian children, 12 to 18 years old, are now required to read "The Poison of Zionism." Over 200,000 copies have been printed, all intended for schools, in which the point is hammered away that Zionists are arch-imperialists whose sole aim is to undermine and destroy socialist states." Anti-Semitic posters are on sale and prominently displayed in book stores.

Articles in the Soviet Criminal Code pertaining to "malicious hooliganism," "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda with the intent to defame the Soviet Union," parasitism" are but a few of the laws used as catchalls to arrest and convict Refuseniks. There has never been a case in which a refusenik has been found innocent.

NAZI CONTROLLED EUROPE: 1930'S

The Conspiracy Theory: Jews control the World. Use of mass media as propaganda weapon against the Jews.

U.S.S.R.: 1970'S TO NOW

March, 1980: A Moscow TV program announced that "Zionists have seized power everywhere: banks, newspapers, governments" * * * "Jews speak to much about their victims during the Second World War" * * * the words "final solution" were mentioned without a specific reference as to whom it was directed.

NAZI CONTROLLED EUROPE: 1930'S

Scholars dismissed from University posts because they are Jews.

U.S.S.R.: 1970'S TO NOW

The following is only a partial list of Jewish academicians stripped of degrees and fired from university posts: Drs. Apekin, Shazkina, Vasilevsky, Gurfinkel, Bogdatjeva, Radin. Drs. Senderov and Kanevsky were arrested and convicted after they authorized a treatise "Intellectual Genocide," a documentation of discrimination against Jewish applicants to mathematics departments at Soviet institutions of higher learning.

NAZI CONTROLLED EUROPE: 1930'S

Economic harassment and discrimination against Jews.

U.S.S.R.: 1970'S TO NOW

When Soviet Jews apply to emigrate, they are often fired from their jobs. The KGB makes certain that they are unable to get other jobs in their fields; and, further, menial jobs are difficult to get because the KGB advises prospective employers that the Refuseniks applying are "over-qualified for the job." They are thus forced to live on their savings, unable to earn a living in a country where unemployment, called "parasitism," is a punishable crime, for which some Refuseniks have been jailed.

NAZI CONTROLLED EUROPE: 1930'S

Physical beatings of Jews.

U.S.S.R.: 1970'S TO NOW

Recently, Jews have been beaten up by "hooligans," street ruffians doing the bidding of the KGB. The recent beating of Leningrad Refusenik Vladimir Kizelshtein by uniformed militiamen reflects the "gloves off" attitude now surfacing in the police offices.

NAZI CONTROLLED EUROPE: 1930'S

Torture disguised as medical treatment.

U.S.S.R.: 1970'S TO NOW

Psychiatric institutions are, despite protests from international psychiatric societies, used to incarcerate Refuseniks where they are subject to "tests," and "treatment," another form of torture.

Mr. Speaker, there can be little doubt from this article that history can be, and is being, repeated. It is for this reason that we cannot forget our brothers and sisters and that is why we are here today. We must remain vigilant and continue to call upon the leaders of the Soviet Union to moderate the oppression of their Jewish citizens and to allow them the freedoms and rights guaranteed to them by the Soviet constitution and by the Helsinki accords.●

● Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues, Mr. GILMAN and Mr. RANGEL, this evening as they address the vitally important issue of the treatment of Soviet Jewry. This is a community persecuted by its own government. They are a people made unwelcome in their own country; they are a people denied their civil and human rights.

On May 5, 1985, Americans will gather in New York City in a show of solidarity with the persecuted Jews of the Soviet Union. Today, we stand together in this House of Representatives spiritually united in that show of solidarity. We declare to the Government of the Soviet Union that the plight of these victims will be heard, whether they are dissidents or refuseniks.

It appears that the Soviets are not content with slowing Jewish emigration to a trickle, leaving people stranded in a no-man's land of nonpersons. During the past year, they have intensified their attacks against the Jewish community and its cultural traditions. It is with great sadness that we read of the blinding of prisoner of conscience, Iosif Berenshtein, who was beaten in his jail cell. Mrs. Berenshtein, inquiring as to the state of her husband's health shortly after the beating, was callously told by Mr. Beregovoy, the head of the Zhitomir Medical Section of the Department of Interior Affairs that "I would like to inform you that the prisoner Berenshtein, Iosif Yakovlevich, inflicted on himself bodily harm in the form of stabbing and cutting injuries on both his eyes, while acting on his own and while being held in his place of detention * * *."

The arrests and trials of Hebrew teachers also continues. Evgeny Aisenberg of Kharkov was arrested on March 19; he has been the Kharkov Jewish community's only Hebrew teacher. Aleksandr Kholmiansky, earlier convicted and sentenced, arrived at a prison camp in Sverdlovsk. Yuli Edelshtein, too, arrived at a prison camp in Ulanude, close to the Mongolian border. Dan Shapira is being tried as we speak. The crime of all of these brave men is that they wanted to teach. They wanted to nurture the children of their community sharing with them as ancient and beautiful tradition. It would appear that the Soviets are not content with denying the present, they would also like to deny history.

In the spirit of the Helsinki accords, which both of our nations signed almost 10 years ago, we in the U.S. Congress call upon the Soviets to reconsider their treatment of Soviet Jews; let them be citizens or let them go. I join with my colleagues and all Americans as they call to the world's attention the plight of these good and just people.●

● Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my dear friends from New York, CHARLIE RANGEL and BEN GILMAN, for holding this special order to commemorate our solidarity with the Jews of the Soviet Union. Once again we are telling the leaders of the U.S.S.R. that the deprivation of basic human rights which is sanctioned and practiced by that government is repugnant to a large and growing number of men and women in all parts of the world.

Over the years I have asked myself why the U.S.S.R. persists in its barbaric treatment of the Jews and other minorities. By denying Soviet Jews the right to teach and practice their religion and by discriminating against them in education and employment, the Soviet Union is building day by day an international reputation that gives the lie to every claim that there is a humanitarian motivation to its policies and economic theories.

It would be eminently reasonable and sensible for the new leadership in the Kremlin to change these destructive policies. Let the Jews freely emigrate, and free them from the state-sponsored harassment and deprivation, and in doing these things the Soviet Union would add greatly to its influence and credibility in the world. We are listening and waiting. I hope they will act.●

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in urging the leadership of the Soviet Union to grant exit visas to all Jews wishing to emigrate and religious freedom to those who wish to remain.

New leadership in the Soviet Union, resumption of arms talks, the possibility of a summit conference, all hold out the promise for improved United States-Soviet relations. A gesture on the part of the Soviets toward the Jewish "prisoners of conscience" would not go unnoticed by this Congress.

The climate for reconciliation between our two nations continues to be poisoned by the Soviet's blatant disregard for basic human rights. This Congress and this Nation cannot turn a blind eye to these violations. The Soviet Union was a signator to the Helsinki accords, and we fully expect them to abide by the provisions of that agreement.

We have no choice but to coexist with the Soviet Union. But if they are truly interested in reducing tensions and creating a new spirit of cooperation, they must live up to their previous commitments. As long as people are persecuted for exercising their inalienable right to emigrate or practice their faith, we cannot sanction a policy of "business as usual" with the Soviet Union.●

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my New York colleagues, Representatives RANGEL and GILMAN, for organizing this special order on behalf of Soviet Jewry.

As many of you know, this Sunday is Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry, an annual event in my district when thousands of people gather at the United Nations to focus the attention of the world on this state-sponsored repression and discrimination.

This Sunday is an especially appropriate time for this annual commemoration for, as we all know, it is also the day in which Americans will be honoring the liberators of Western Europe and the Nazi concentration camps. It is the horrible lesson of World War II which should drive us all in our never-ending struggle to free the thousands of Soviet Jews in captivity today. So I urge my colleagues who will be joining me in commemorations this weekend, to remember the 6 million, to remember the 600,000 captive Soviet Jews, and to remember that we can and must continue to jog the memories and the conscience of humankind.

I would also like to take this opportunity to mention a resolution which I am introducing on behalf of Dr. Semyon Gluzman and his family. Unfortunately, this is the third Congress in which I have introduced resolutions on behalf of Dr. Gluzman and yet this one-time prisoner of conscience remains a virtual prisoner of the state.

Semyon Gluzman's story is one of tremendous courage and conviction. Thirteen years ago, Dr. Gluzman, a trained and talented psychiatrist, was arrested and convicted of "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda." His "crimes" lay in his refusal to cooperate with the KGB in branding human rights and political activists as mentally ill, as well as in his chronicling of Soviet psychiatric abuses in several samizdat articles.

As punishment, Dr. Gluzman was sentenced to 7 years of hard labor and an additional 3 years of internal exile in Siberia. While in prison, Dr. Gluzman coauthored a guide for fellow dissidents describing techniques to prevent being classified as mentally ill by government psychiatrists and fought for freedom and the more humane treatment of his fellow prisoners. As a result, he was harshly treated by prison guards and spent much of his time in solitary confinement. Though still a young man, Dr. Gluzman left prison with his health broken.

After his release from internal exile in May 1982 Gluzman sought to emigrate to Israel from Siberia. He was refused permission and returned to his native Kiev. Although Dr. Gluzman has continuously expressed his desire to emigrate, Soviet authorities have stated that at no time will he be allowed to do so.

The 3 years Dr. Gluzman has spent in Kiev since his release have been neither happy nor productive ones for him. He has been subjected to harassment and physical abuse and continues to be denied permission to work as a psychiatrist. He currently fills an administrative position at a clinic in Kiev.

The Soviets have denied the Gluzmans the right to live full lives in the U.S.S.R. and at the same time the right to emigrate to Israel. We, in the Congress of the United States, have a responsibility to the Gluzmans and to the many other refuseniks whom we have "adopted" to see to it that the Soviets uphold internationally recognized standards of human rights. I urge my colleagues to join me by cosponsoring House Joint Resolution 270 and by making our voices heard this Sunday.●

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, massive preparations are currently underway in New York for Solidarity Sunday 1985, this year slated for May 5. Hundreds of thousands of marchers and spectators are expected to show their unwavering support in this 14th annual demonstration with refuseniks who have been denied basic human freedoms, including the right to emigrate, and practice their religion.

In light of the continuing repressive campaign the Soviet Government is waging against its Jewish citizens, this rally is a crucial expression of American support for our oppressed brothers and sisters behind the iron curtain.

I have long attended this rally, and believe our presence makes a difference. Despite the low number of emigrants who have been granted permission to leave over the past several years, I know our vigilance makes a difference in their struggle. The refuseniks are infused with new energy and determination because they receive the message that they are not alone and their struggle is not in vain.

I am honored to support Solidarity Sunday and commend my colleagues from New York, Mr. GILMAN and Mr. RANGEL, for reserving this time to pay tribute to all of Sunday's participants.●

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great sense of honor and conviction that I rise to join my colleagues as we declare our solidarity with the persecuted Jews of the Soviet Union.

For the past several years, the world has witnessed the hideous progression of what is now officially sanctioned anti-Semitism. It is a crime in the U.S.S.R. to practice Judaism. Soviet Jews cannot gather to worship, they cannot teach their language, they cannot pass along their traditions, and yet they cannot leave the country to pursue their rights. Once they apply for exist visas, most find that, too, is a crime. They often lose their jobs, become social outcasts, get drafted into military service, or are imprisoned.

The Soviets usually deny the right to emigrate on the basis that the individual's emigration is not "in the interest of the Soviet Union." If world opinion is important to the Soviet Government, and if adhering to their own international agreements is a consideration of Soviet diplomacy, then guaranteeing human rights, be it the freedom to practice religion or the freedom to emigrate, is always in the interest of the Soviet Union.

The preservation of world peace is in the mutual interest of the United States and the U.S.S.R. With Mr. Gorbachev's recent ascent to power and the renewed willingness of both countries to come to the negotiating table, the Soviets have an opportunity to significantly improve relations. Releasing the chains on Soviet Jewry will not only encourage U.S. trade concessions, but will also prove the diplomatic integrity of the new Soviet leadership.

Today, we declare our solidarity with Yakov Levin, Aleksandr Kholmiansky, Yakov Mesh, Iosif Berenshtein, Iosif Begun, and the thousands of others who long for religious freedom. As the symbol of freedom for oppressed people all over the world, we have an obligation to the Jews of the Soviet Union. The lessons of the Holocaust are permanently embedded in our hearts and minds. Our efforts to end the persecution will not end until every Jew is granted religious freedom.●

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge my colleagues to cosponsor House Resolution 127, expressing the support of the House of Representatives for "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" on May 5, 1985. This event provides a timely opportunity for Congress to reaffirm its commitment to religious freedom and personal liberty everywhere in the world.

Basic human rights, including the freedom to practice one's religion, are routinely and increasingly violated by the Soviet authorities. Emigration from the U.S.S.R. last year fell to an all-time low of only 896 people. We will never have a better opportunity to impress upon the new Soviet leadership how seriously we view these sad developments.

This Sunday, May 5, 1985, I will be leading a large delegation of citizens from the Third District of Connecticut and elsewhere in the State to the 14th annual "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" rally at the United Nations in New York City. As many as a quarter of a million people are expected to attend this gathering, sponsored by the Coalition to Free Soviet Jews, to demonstrate their support for freedom and liberty and the right to practice one's chosen religion.

It is time that the United States as a nation raise its unified voice in support of these same ideals. I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring House Resolution 127 and hope that many will take the time this Sunday to demonstrate their support for "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jews."●

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues from New York [Mr. RANGEL and Mr. GILMAN] in calling attention to the "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" rally in New York.

As my colleagues are aware, May 5 is the 14th annual rally held in New York to express solidarity with the oppressed Jewish community in the Soviet Union. I commend the organizers of this for their dedication to the cause of Soviet Jewry, and for their fine efforts to remind the Soviet Government of our concern for the victims of human rights abuses in their country.

Earlier this year, over 140 of my colleagues in the House and Senate joined me in writing to General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev to express our concern over the treatment of Jews in the Soviet Union. In our letter, we noted the signals from the leaders of both of our countries indicating a desire for improved relations. The meetings in Geneva on arms negotiations and the anticipated meeting between Mr. Gorbachev and President Reagan are both signals of this commitment to reducing the tension between the two great superpowers.

In our letter, as we do at every opportunity, my colleagues and I urged Mr. Gorbachev to make a risk-free gesture to the Western world to symbolize his true commitment to world peace. We explained to Mr. Gorbachev that as the new leader of the U.S.S.R., we hoped that he could end the repressive policies aimed against the Jewish community in his country.

We have witnessed the power Mr. Gorbachev has used in making changes in the Soviet Government. Unfortunately, we have yet to see him use his authority to improve the state of affairs for the Jewish community in the U.S.S.R. He appears to have turned his back on our suggestion. The Jewish community continues to suffer greatly.

During the past month, we have heard several rumors that the Soviet Government was ready to ease its repressive policies. Yet none of these rumors have been substantiated—and it appears that the Soviet Government is still sponsoring a strong anti-Semitic campaign.

Many of my colleagues who have visited the Soviet Union and met with refuseniks have come to know the story of Abe Stolar. Abe was born in Chicago, IL, in 1911 and emigrated to the Soviet Union with his parents as a young man. Since 1974, Abe and his family have been waiting for permission to emigrate. In 1975, he and his family were granted permission—yet once they reached the airport, they were turned away by the visa office for an alleged error in Mrs. Stolar's visa.

Two weeks ago, it looked as if the Stolar family was finally going to be allowed to emigrate. But once again, the door of freedom was slammed shut in their face. The Soviet authorities had refused to grant an exist visa to one member of their family. As a result, the rest of the Stolar family turned down the opportunity to emigrate. In response to that situation, 40 of my colleagues joined in sending a telegram to Mr. Gorbachev asking that he intervene to allow the family to emigrate. Our request has so far fallen on deaf ears; today, Abe and his family are no closer to freedom than before.

Simon Levin is another Chicagoan who knows well the Kremlin's policy of refusing its citizens the right to emigrate. In 1978, Simon was allowed permission to leave the Soviet Union, with the understanding that his pregnant wife would soon be allowed to join him. Seven years later, Simon is still waiting for his wife to be granted an exit visa, and has never seen his son Mark. Out of frustration and desperation over her situation, Simon's wife, Tamara, began a hunger strike 6 weeks ago. Today, she is still fasting. In the shadow of death, Tamara clings to the hope that she can be reunited with her husband. Her husband hopes that Tamara's fast will become a call for justice, and that world opinion-makers will echo her plea for freedom.

This call for freedom is one that has been carried throughout the history of the Jewish people. Today, I join with my colleagues in raising my voice to protest the Soviet Government's policy of denying its citizens the right to live where they choose and to practice their religious beliefs. We wish to call attention to the plight of American citizens, like Abe Stolar and Simon Levin, who are also caught in the web of Soviet oppression. And although we have great hopes for negotiations with the Soviets, we must keep in mind their refusal to live by international agreements on human rights.

We hope we will start seeing a signal of compasssion from within the Kremlin. I pray that one day soon the fight for freedom will succeed in bringing lead Abe Stolar and Tamara Tretyakova to the United States.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THE TIME HAS COME TO SIMPLIFY THE TAX CODE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROSE] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, for many, many years now there has been a move afoot in this country to simplify our Tax Code.

I have kept a file on some very interesting case histories that I have received from individuals who are in the business community that point very, very clearly to the need of a simplified Tax Code.

I saw Senator SIMPSON quoted recently in a publication where he said that, there are 30,00 lawyers and lobbyists in Washington, each of whom is paid to protect just one word or one paragraph in the Tax Code.

Mr. Speaker, the time has come for us to make the Tax Code simpler, to make it simpler so that the tax burden of running this Government is equally spread across the entire base of this Nation. It is also time to redo the Tax Code so that the Internal Revenue Service and its agents who are charged with the responsibility of and enforcing it can do that in a fair and clear manner for everybody.

I have here a letter that I got several months ago from a businessman, a very wealthy businessman, that points to one great problem that he had seen with the current Tax Code.

I have made notes, and I will read the gist of what he has said to me:

I suppose that I have looked at several hundred companies in the past 30 years, I have purchased personally or helped a company to purchase at least 100 companies. These purchases ranged from several hundred thousand dollars to into the millions. Everytime we got close to making a final deal, the owner of the small and medium sized privately held companies would tell you about items of expense and inventory which had not been reported to the IRS in the proper manner. In the case of large companies, the executives would tell you about their maids, chauffeurs, apartments, use of airplanes, and expense accounts. In addition to long term consulting agreements, large sums of money are really only an increase in price of the company because the executives not only accepted the money as consulting fees but did not do anything at all to earn it. I can give you two personal examples of medium size companies and a large company.

A number of years ago, a gentleman had a company he wanted to sell for $5,000,000.00 cash. I personally went and examined in great detail a number of people he had running the company and the financial results. From a business standpoint, I could see almost immediately that his overhead was way in excess of what it should be in a company of that size, with that type of business. It appeared to me on that surface that this company could be paid out, or could have paid for itself in five years. I bought the company for five million cash and paid it out in 18 months. What I found was this: I found four twin engine airplanes, each with two pilots, one for the owner and the other three were his sons, two of them were going to college. I found his wife's hairdresser, their maid and their chauffeur, all on his payroll. He had at least three girlfriends who he was supporting on the payroll who had never seen the inside of the office. I could go on and on but the net result was he sold the company at what he thought was a fair price but after I cleaned it up, it was making at least twice what he thought it was making, never really knowing the true value of the company because of the many things he did to avoid income tax.

All the things he did, whether they may not have been moral, were certainly allowable under the current structure of our Tax Code.

And then he said:

I was involved in purchasing a large company for an amount in excess of several hundred million dollars. Negotiations for this company went on in the normal way negotiations go. When it appeared that we were close to the price that we were willing to pay, the President and Chief Executive Officer of the company said, and I quote from this man's letter: "We are willing to trade on the basis of the price that we've agreed to, but there are things which myself and three other executives will require before we make a trade." He had them listed for me, and they included four chauffeurs with a lifetime income, five maids with a lifetime income, two jet airplanes to be at their disposal, one apartment in Europe and one in Hong Kong, a new car of their choice every two years and all expenses for fifteen years plus an income of $300,000 for fifteen years. It occurred that these executives had been getting this anyway. Most of what had been involved was for their personal income anyway so it was agreed that we would give them these things. The deal was struck and today, to the best of my knowledge, they are still paying these individuals who contribute nothing to the company, but the company is deducting these costs as business expenses.

Another gentleman wrote me about the problem of taxes for wealthy individuals. He said:

The wealthy individuals that I am talking about, Congressman, are the people who are worth in excess of several million dollars. All of these, as long as I have been in business, have legitimate ways of not paying taxes in excess of capital gain rates. This situation came about because the complex laws that Congress made and the interpretation put on those laws by the Internal Revenue Service. These of course include foreign tax credits, commercial buildings, houses, low rent subsidiaries, public housing, depletion on oil and gas, farms, cattle ranches and many other tax shelters which wealthy people can and do take advantage of. I personally have known people who had in excess of three to five million dollars who pay no taxes because they have these tax shelters. In fact, I saw an article in the paper recently where approximately 100 people who had over a million income paid no taxes because of foreign tax credits and real estate shelters. All of the wealthy people I have known have tax experts who are constantly trying to outwit the Internal Revenue Service.

There is one person who concentrates on their business all of the time and most of them I have known in the past operate in the grey area with all of their tax reports. The accountants would tell them "this is a grey area" the worst you can do is have the IRS check you and assess you a tax which you can fight in tax court—if you lose the only consequence is the tax plus interest and legal fees involved. You and I know that the IRS cannot check all these grey areas. Hundreds of millions of dollars in taxes are lost.

And I am not blaming the IRS for this. This is the way we have written the Tax Code and this is the mess that we hand them to enforce.

The gentleman further writes:

What I am trying to demonstrate in this letter, is the fact that fraud tax cases used to involve in general only wealthy individuals. Today we have a flood of tax cases all over the United States for not only the tax court but also in the district courts. The tax problems that we have today involve big companies, wealthy individuals that kind of do what they want to because the IRS does not have enough people to check out all the operations of the large companies and wealthy individuals. This problem now involves small and medium sized companies, they involve farmers, waitresses, and ordinary working people. Each time some new law is passed or some new regulation is put out by the IRS it is an effort to put a finger in a dike that is already broken wide open. All of these new regulations they are putting out and the new interpretations of the code just makes more dishonest people in the United States.

The real foundation of our democracy calls for an honest tax system that regulates taxes on a fair and equitable basis based on a person's income. You are finding some of the wealthier people in this country are paying no tax at all because of the lobbyists and the pressures being brought by them to find some tax gimmick for their companies or their clients.

Isn't it a shame, he writes, that the IRS is out trying to find out how many tips a waitress gets? Isn't it a shame that a man has to keep speedometer readings in order to get deductions on the use of his car?

Well, you will be happy to know we are, hopefully, about to do away with that one.

Isn't it a shame that there are banks and insurance companies in the United States that pay only 10 to 14 percent income tax? Isn't it a shame that some of the wealthier people in this country pay no income tax at all?

The bottom line is that all of the things I mention in this letter is that our tax system has broken down entirely.

The Internal Revenue System, with the connivance of Congress, he says, has put out so many laws and so many regulations that they have become almost a joke to the American people. It has become almost a national pastime to see how much that you can get away with without paying your fair share of taxes. I think it was more vividly brought to me last year than it has ever been when I happened to be in an accountant's office—he was not a CPA—who was figuring out an individual's tax return. The accountant asked the low-income fisherman why he had not put down a deduction for insulating his house. He said, he did not insulate his house. And she said, "Oh, don't worry about that, everyone is taking that deduction, so there is no need for you not to take it too. The IRS never checks, anyway, to see if you insulated your house or not because you are in a relative low-income bracket."

Mr. Speaker, that is pathetic.

Another example—and I will be brief and conclude—

About 30 years ago I hired a black tire changer, this man wrote me from the Midwest. He was such an excellent employee that I gave him an opportunity to become a mechanic. He attended several mechanic schools, and, as a result he became an excellent, first-class mechanic, made about $1,800 a month. He stayed in California for a year, then he returned to his home and came to me and asked for his old job. I handed him a W-4 form to sign. I asked him how many dependents he had, and he answered, "How many do I have to have not to pay any taxes?" I looked at a tax table and told him he needed 7, that included his wife and 7 children. I asked him if he had recently married and acquired these dependents. He said, no, he had never married and didn't intend to every marry. I said to him, "John, if you sign this W-4 form, it will be fraud and you will be subject to criminal charges which could result in a prison term." He asked, "Have you ever seen the Internal Revenue put a working mechanic in jail? The government will just have to give me food and shelter and take care of me. Besides, everyone else does it." I told him that that was a matter between his conscience and the IRS. He went back to his job, and to this day he still has 8 dependents, only their names have changed.

After this, I hired a detective that I knew in my hometown, and I checked about 300 employers in my community who were either drivers or mechanics or blue-collar workers. It took him about 7 or 8 months, and he didn't get but about 200 of the people that I asked him to check. Of the 300 that we had listed, 200 had falsified in some way what they said to the government on their W-4 form.

In the past year since then I have witnessed an exceptional number of the lower income group people in this country evading taxes. Some of the many cases involved maids and cooks and maintenance workers. It is not uncommon now for someone in the low-income group to tell you that they are willing to work but are not willing to have Social Security and income taxes deducted from their pay, they will only work for cash. Service people, plumbers, electricians, carpenters, repair people, in most cases either request cash or they give you two bills, one for cash and one for a check. You can bet that most people pay cash. They cannot deduct the cost of the work anyway, they take the cash rate, which of course could be much cheaper. I know of a great many farmers and cattle people, most of whom receive some cash which is never recorded, or they put gas and diesel in their wives' and children's cars and charge it to farm operating costs. The farmers in many, many cases that I have seen trade cattle and hog meat and other produce raised on their farms in exchange for medical care, for the use of boats, personal hotel bills, and many, many other personal needs.

He had for many years been buying crabmeat from a crabber in eastern North Carolina, and this crabber came to me one day and said he couldn't sell me crabmeat any more, and I asked him why. He said he had never paid any income taxes on the money he had made selling crabmeat but his business had gotten so good he just could not sell it to me any more for cash. I told him I was sorry because he had the best crabmeat in the eastern part of the State. He said he did not mean he would not stop selling me crabmeat but he would just have to trade it to me for something. I told him I didn't have anything I could trade him for it. He said, "You have got a freezer full of steak, so we could trade crabmeat for steak." He went away happy, I had my crabmeat, he had his beef.

It is really a shame that every time you make a purchase or sale of a business, the first thing you look at is what effect does it have on taxes. You do not dare to make a move today that involves any amount of money without checking with your tax experts.

I think we are at a crisis in this country, and I do not believe that half of what is out there has actually come to light. I hope and pray that we can move very quickly in this country and rewrite our tax laws and make some inroads into this fraud that is creeping all across the country and adopt the new proposed flat tax that Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI is advocating that we have for this country.

Another gentleman wrote me—and I will have only a few more—a number of years ago, he said:

I had an IRS agent who checked my returns. He was honest and diligent and he was intelligent. I always felt like when he got through with my accounts that he did a good job for the government and the taxpayer. This did not mean we didn't have differences of opinion when we began to deal in new laws and regulations that created gray areas. In fact, we took him to district court on a number of cases and won each and every time. My tax expert spent all of his time on my business, all of it, and the agent only had a certain number of hours that he could put on my return. It was very obvious that the agent could not and did not spend the time on my business that my own tax experts did.

A number of years later he retired. He came by my office to tell me that he was going to California. He then made a statement that I have often thought about, and he said, "I have really enjoyed working on your tax returns. Your business is varied and it is different. It has always been interesting to me. We have had our differences and you have won your cases over the years, because I did not have the time to spend on them that your tax expert did in trying to figure out how you could pay the least amount of taxes. I used to believe I could go into a man's office and leave satisfied that I had done a fair and good job for the government and the taxpayer.

Honestly, I can't now examine a complicated tax return and leave feeling like I have been fair to the Government and the taxpayer. Congress has passed numerous laws involving taxes and the bureaucracy of the IRS interprets these laws through the Tax Courts in such a way that I cannot anymore examine a man's return and feel like I have done the Government and the taxpayer a good job. All these rules and regulations only serve to make liars out of more taxpayers each and everytime a new law or a new regulation is passed. There is not a young agent in the service today who can examine my tax return and tell for sure whether it is correct or not. The grey areas are so complicated that I myself, an agent with 27 years experience, am unable to decipher them on a fair and equitable basis.

After this agent left the service, I began to get new agents in to examine my returns. In great succession, I had agents that in my opinion did an absolutely poor job in the examination of my business. Even though the return involved millions of dollars in transactions, most of the time the agents spent their time looking at travel and entertainment, telephone bills and other matters really of little or no consequence. I will never forget one day at lunch, an agent came into my office with a partnership agreement that involved millions of dollars, the agreement itself cost our business $150,000 to prepare and was prepared by a well known law firm. It covered approximately 600 pages. He asked me if he could take it out to lunch and I said sure—bring it back when you are finished with it. He took it with him and returned to my office about 2:00 p.m., laid the document on my desk and said "it looks all right to me". It didn't take a genius to see that he didn't understand anything in that agreement that related to my taxes. Each year the agents who come to my office are more and more less prepared to examine anybody's tax return. Isn't it a shame that the IRS has a telephone system where you can call to get answers to your tax problems and they tell you that what they say might not be correct and do not depend on their answers. There is a recent article in the Wall Street Journal where a reporter called something like seven different offices of the IRS and asked them the same question and got six different answers, none of which the IRS recognized as correct.

It is impossible under the tax codes and regulations, for a large majority of people in this country to make out their own tax returns. The accountants who they go to, generally are more interested in saving them money than they are for collecting taxes for our government.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude at this time and reserve a special order next week to include the remainder of this. The point and the bottom line is very simple: The Tax Code of the United States is far too complicated. People are evading millions and millions of dollars in tax liability because of these complicated tax laws and regulations. Agents are unable to enforce them as we have written the laws.

I suppose and believe that the real reason that we need to rewrite the tax laws is fairness. Fairness for everybody. But I am convinced that if we write a Tax Code fairly, that billions of more dollars will be paid into the Treasury of the United States than is now being paid into the Treasury, and that we will go a long way toward solving the deficit problem that our Government faces if we will simply install a flat, fair tax for all Americans.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and I yield back the balance of my time.

CINCO DE MAYO

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA] is recognized for 60 minutes.

ME. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to join with my colleagues to extend our greetings to the citizens and the Government of the Republic of Mexico, our neighbors to the south.

Shortly after our battle for independence or our battles for independence in 1776, some 30-odd years later, Mexico declared itself independent and was successful in achieving that independence. We from Great Britian and they from Spain. Possibly the two major countries in the world at that time.

Of unique interest to us is the fact that what we, the Founding Fathers of this great Republic of ours were saying in New York and Philadelphia and throughout the Colonies of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, of freedom, of the freedom of the individual. Of the desire to govern themselves; of the birth, actually a very novel experiment of government by the consent of the governed, and of government of, for and by the people, that we also cherish.

The same things were being echoed farther to the south in the new Republic of Mexico which was then "New Spain" as it was called. Again, of unique interest is the fact that almost everything west of the Mississippi including my State of Texas, in 1776, were part of New Spain, and not a part of the initial endeavor of the Colonies of the Northeast.

Then, through circumstances and history, we became a part of the United States of America. By "we" I mean Texas, now New Mexico, Arizona, California, parts of Colorado, Washington, Oregon, and in fact, almost everything west of the Mississippi.

I say this as a preface to why it is that we congratulate and unify ourselves with the people of Mexico on the fifth of May, or otherwise known as "Cinco de Mayo." Because we were fortunate that after our independence we were able to maintain the stability of our Government, and that which was fought for and gained became then the tradition that we, 209 years later, still cherish and love and the Government that we abide by, that Constitution and that Declaration of Independence, still a few blocks from here, are there.

But not so for Mexico. They had the unfortunate situation of having to suffer the yoke of foreign intervention, including ours. Including ours in their later years.

But at the Battle of Puebla in the vicinity of the city of Puebla in 1862, when the French had occupied Mexico, and under Napoleon III, had placed an emperor over the people of Mexico, an Austrian archduke named Maximilian. He had been placed as Emperor of Mexico, not by a vote of the Mexican people; not by pluralism; not by consent, but rather by the forces of the French Emperor.

Now I am happy to say that a young Texan named Ignacio Saragoza, who was a general at a very early age, led the Mexican troops that defeated the French. Not only is the significant part that freedom and justice and equality and the things that we cherish and our Mexican brethren cherish, not only were they successful or was that the begining of their success, but also that the French troops were in the highest tradition of the European-trained military. This group of Mexicans, not trained in that tradition, were able to defeat them. A few years later, in 1867, the Mexican people, forever, threw off the yoke of foreign intervention in their country and became then, as we know now, the democratic state, the Republic of Mexico.

Let me say that Gen. Ignacio Saragoza was born in Bahia del Espiritu Santo. That is near the now city of Goliad, TX.

From there he traveled through various areas, joined the military and became a general, one of the youngest generals. The unfortunate thing is that not too many years later, under 30 years of age, he passed away and was not able to really live the victory that he had assured by leading the Mexican forces at the Battle of Puebla.

In 1867 the French were defeated and Benito Juarez, the rightful, democratically elected President of Mexico, regained his position and since then Mexico has progressed. Even then they had problems, and it was not until 1910 that the final revolution took place wherein they now, 75 years this year, Mexico now has a continuous, successful democratic institution, but 175 years ago they severed their relationships with Spain, shortly after we had severed our relations with Great Britain.

So it is with that in mind that I ask my colleagues to join with me in extending our greetings, our felicitations, to the Government and to the people of Mexico. We in this country have suffered, as they have, military intervention. Fortunately for us, basically it ended with our Declaration of Independence, although we did have some problems with the French in the middle of the last century.

But the fact is that now our two countries work hand in hand, our two peoples basically in many areas are one, and perhaps the gentleman from Texas speaking at this time would be the best example because my ancestors came from Spain in the middle 1700's to what was them New Spain. Then they settled on the north side of the Rio Grande, and when Texas became independent from Mexico, we then became Texans. When Texas joined the Union, we then became citizens of the United States of America.

When I hear the bell at Philadelphia, the echo rings back from the bell at a little village in Mexico where Father Hidalgo and all of the other Mexican patriots who secured Mexico's independence. This little village is named Dolores Hidalgo in the State of Guanajuato, and perhaps history will record that maybe it was not by accident that they were saying the same things in Philadelphia and at Dolores Hidalgo, that they were feeling the same inherent desire for life and liberty and freedom and that a bell was rung at Philadelphia and a few years later a bell rang at Dolores Hidalgo declaring both peoples, at the time, their independence from the yoke of European domination and that today we are able, a descendant of that other group, because of history, now has become a citizen of this great country of ours and that I should be able to speak here as an American, as a Member of this Congress probably is the most significant factor in the relationship between ourselves and the Republic of Mexico in that the people have never severed their relations. There have been problems, but I say they possibly were mistakes of government and not of the people. The people have always been together because many of us rightfully belong to both sides because we were a part of one and we became a part of the other, and now we share in our sentiments, in our heritage, in our culture, in our language, in our everything, but most of all in our hearts, that dual pride that my forefathers began with the one and here I end with the other, and that we can have the freedom and the liberty to be able to express our sentiments and to, on behalf of the people of the United States, congratulate the people of Mexico in that both of us now, in this, the year of our Lord 1985, both of us are able to declare that our people are basically, to the extent humanly possible, through the faults and failures of a democratic institution, but nonetheless that their Constitution and our Constitution guarantee the inherent right given to us by our Maker, and that, my dear friends, is what our sentiments are as we send our congratulations to the people of Mexico on their celebration of Cinco de Mayo.

CENTRAL AMERICA: DOSE OF REALITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, basically, Congress prohibited U.S. funding for any efforts to overthrow Nicaragua by CIA personnel and U.S. funding of the Contras' activity in Nicaragua. Since the passage of this prohibition, the President has admitted that his intention all along, despite the congressional mandate, was to change the Government of Nicaragua and make the Sandinistas say "uncle." The President knows as well as we all do that to change a government by military force clearly is to overthrow it.

The congressional mandate of which I speak—the so-called Boland amendment—embodied principles of international law and the charter of the Organization of American States. The United States is a member of the OAS, yet the administration consistently has ignored U.S. obligations and responsibilities pursuant to our participation in the OAS. In fact, international law apparently is of absolutely no concern to this administration, as evidenced by the President's statement this morning that the United States will ignore any actions brought before the World Court regarding the recently imposed sanctions, or any other U.S. actions. The President made the same decision last January, and yet how many of us realize that just because we refuse to participate in these legal proceedings, the World Court continues its business. Just because the United States withdrew, does not mean that Nicaragua withdrew.

The President clearly is escalating the tensions between the United States and Nicaragua. Congress is not doing this—Congress has asked for a peaceful approach to the problem, yet the administration continues to fuel the fire with its every resource. And why has the administration taken its most recent actions of imposing sanctions on Nicaragua and of ignoring the World Court? Mr. Speaker, the President is simply laying the groundwork for his next request for military aid for the Contras. He will be working over the next few months to create as big a crisis as possible in order to justify military intervention in Central America.

After all, this is the President's pattern: He desperately wanted Federal Budget cuts—a very unpopular proposal—so he set the groundwork by cutting taxes, which made the Federal deficit balloon out of control, which created a crisis, which has played on the conscience of the American people, which makes a tax increase or budget cuts absolutely necessary. He set up the Geneva talks to create an apparent crisis to justify the MX missile. And he is setting up the stage for a horrendous crisis in Central America so that he can get his Contra aid this fall and continue to conduct an illegal war which will eventually involve our own U.S. troops.●

URGING A NONVIOLENT POLITICAL SOLUTION TO CONFLICT IN NORTHERN IRELAND

(Mr. O'NEILL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I recently had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Denis Haughey, a leader of the nonviolent Social Democrat and Labour Party and a member of the Northern Ireland Assembly.

In addition to discussing matters concerning Ireland, Mr. Haughey expressed to me his deep concern about Irish-American organizations that condone and support the terrorist IRA. As a friend of Ireland, I believe that political violence is reprehensible and inherently antidemocratic.

Mr. Speaker, I insert the recent interview with Mr. Haughey taken from the Brockton Enterprise, and I hope it will encourage Americans to support a peaceful resolution and call for an end to the killings in Northern Ireland.

NORTHERN IRELAND POLITICIAN SAYS IRA ACTIONS "MISGUIDED"

(By Gil Bliss)

(This interview is dedicated to the memory of Bridgewater State College political science professor Robert Larson of Easton, a man who devoted his life to the notion that politics and cooperation are the fabric that holds our civilization together. Larson died Thursday.)

BRIDGEWATER.—Irish-Americans who support the Irish-Americans who support the Irish Republican Army are "entirely misguided" and "attached to the wrong cause" according to a Catholic Northern Ireland politician whose career has been based on achieving a successful political solution in Ulster through non-violence.

"The violence in Northern Ireland lets the British off the hook all the time. It's easier for them to deal with the violence than it is for them to produce an agreement that allows both sides to live in harmony," said Dennis Haughey, a leader of the non-violent Social Democratic Labour Party and a member of the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Haughey consented to an interview at the Bridgewater home of his cousin, Edward Haughey, an administrator at Bridgewater State College.

At the time, Haughey was in the midst of a 30-day tour of the United States as a guest of the U.S. State Department's International Visitor Program. In an interview with The Enterprise, Haughey outlined the background of the conflict in Ulster, and talked about the history of his political party and the future prospects for peace in the troubled province which remains under British control.

Haughey, 40, is a native of Coal Island in N. Ireland, is a teacher by trade following graduation from college with a joint honors degree in American history and American politics, and divides his time between case work for his SDLP constituents and work on the staff of John Hume, a member of the European Parliament, and leader of the SDLP.

"I can understand why so many people in the Irish-American community feel the way they do in supporting the IRA, but they should be aiming at using political muscle in this country to influence their own government which has a strong and close relationship with Britain," said Haughey.

"This way they can level Britain towards the direction of change. By supporting groups like NORAID, they're just wasting their time," said Haughey.

Haughey pointed out that Irish-Americans have a sentimental attachment for Ireland, but view the conflict as being one between the Irish and the British, a feeling Haughey said is left over from the struggles for independence in Ireland in the early part of this century.

"It's different now," said Haughey. "Four-fifths of Ireland has its independence, the whole thing now is between the people of British descent in Northern Ireland and the rest of the Irish populace."

"That's not going to be solved by shooting people in the back. The only possible way that unity can come is reconciliation between the people. Unity does not come by simply grappling two pieces of territory together or imposing military control," he said.

Haughey's party was a major architect of the New Ireland Forum Report, a document that proposed three possible political solutions for the Ulster problem. The proposals were flatly rejected recently by British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher.

The options included creating a unitary state under control of the Dublin government of the Irish Republic; a federal system featuring a regional government in N. Ireland; and a joint authority agreement, where Dublin and London would share governmental responsibility.

Haughey noted that the British flat rejection of the proposals is indicative of their attitude towards the problem. "It's easy for the British to avoid the difficult questions. They label it as a problem of violence and suppressing terrorism. They lose soldiers, but it presents no public backlash, and the response is measurable and predictable. They feel that a whole series of political proposals could make the situation worse."

Despite the recent rejections, Haughey noted that "significant areas of agreement are beginning to emerge between the British and Irish governments."

Haughey explained that the basic conflict is between Unionists, people of British background who fear that they would be overwhelmed in a government controlled by the Catholics; and Nationalists, people of Irish descent who desire to be part of the Irish Republic governed by Dublin.

He traced the problem back to 1921, when the British partitioned the island in response to a loud and sometimes violent movement for independence throughout Ireland.

"The British had settled English and Scottish settlers in Northern Ireland as a deliberate policy of plantation. The greatest resistance to British rule in Ireland had been in the north, so most of the settlers were planted there. When the Irish Republic achieved independence, the British populace in Northern Ireland was afraid for its future in an independent Ireland, so rather than put effort into a political framework to incorporate those people, they partitioned the island," Haughey explained.

The resulting split created a population in Northern Ireland that was 60 percent British and 40 percent Irish.

He noted that the distinction between Catholic and Protestant is not at the root of the issue, but merely the easiest way to distinguish people of British and Irish descent. "The religious aspect is not so important for Catholics, but it is for some fundamentalist Protestant groups that have an objection to Catholicism as a religion," said Haughey.

"The Unionists realized that the Catholics were more fertile, and their population was expanding rapidly. In order to preserve their control, they introduced a system of institutionalized discrimination towards the Catholic populace in areas of housing and jobs, and they used that system to maintain that majority."

"They created pressure in housing and unemployment to attain a high emigration rate," said Haughey.

Haughey was politically active in college, and upon graduation, he and many of his colleagues believed that they could model a movement for change after the American civil rights movement. "We felt that if we could direct attention towards these abuses, hopefully we could build up enough public pressure to have them corrected," he recalled.

"All previous political efforts at a solution had failed, and the British were content to let sleeping dogs lie."

Another strong influence on the then-budding movement was the example set by Mahatma Gandhi in the movement trying to achieve independence in India, also from what was perceived to be an oppressive British government. "He taught us that the justice of a cause allows people to endure the violence of injustice," said Haughey.

The initial efforts of Haughey and his colleagues were directed towards documenting the discrimination through research, and using it to show the British leaders and people that such a situation did actually exist.

To highlight the situation, a group of lawyers and academics formed the Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association, and in 1968, sponsored a march from Coal Island to Dungannon to highlight what they perceived as lack of civil liberties generated by a "persecuting police force with widespread powers of arrest," according to Haughey.

The march garnered widespread international attention, heartened the participants, and worried the Unionist government, who became determined to put a stop to the movement.

During a subsequent march to Derry, a city long considered an "emotional flashpoint" for Catholics because the composition of the local government had been symbolic of their oppression, the police force attacked the peaceful march, and the entire episode was captured on Irish television and relayed to the British people.

"There, for all the world to see, was visible evidence of the repressive nature of the Northern Ireland state. Television pictures of peaceful marchers being beaten about the head savagely by a police force gone berserk aroused concern in Great Britain," remembered Haughey.

The subsequent commotion and later marches caused the British government to force changes in Ulster, changes that were strongly resisted by the Belfast government. "The marches gave people a sense that if they stood together and their cause was right, and if they took appropriate action, they could bring about changes," he said.

The Belfast government was so resistant to the changes that Haughey and his contemporaries felt an organized party for the Nationalists in Northern Ireland was necessary to try and create a framework that could accommodate "normal and healthy changes."

The SDLP was formed, and "the civil rights movement had seized everyone's imagination," according to Haughey. However, another movement was also underway.

"The excitement of the civil rights demonstrations and the resistance of the Belfast government to any kind of change frustrated and angered so many people that the extremist fringe began to acquire more and more support." He said that the extremist groups had not had much support during the success of the civil rights movement.

"In 1970 and 1971, they began to launch into the old activity of bombs and bullets again," he said. "We were angry, because he believed that steady responsible pressure was bringing about steady change. The IRA's campaign of violence detracts attention from the central issue which is trying to live together in peace, freedom, and cooperation."

From 1973-1974, a cabinet consisting of both Unionist and Nationalist elements was put together, and steps had been taken to alleviate the tense political situation by providing Catholic representation in the government. Extremist Protestant groups forced strikes protesting what they perceived as an erosion of their power, and the British government failed to stand up to them, according to Haughey. As a result, the cooperative experiment failed.

"That was the best chance we had at creating a framework to work together," said Haughey.

At this point, Haughey sees the problem as one that can't be solved within Northern Ireland, but one that must be tackled by the governments in Dublin and London. "They're the only two agencies that have the muscle and elbow room as sovereign governments to get something done," he said. "If the British slam the lid on Northern Ireland and sit on it, what's going to happen is going to be pretty scary."

Haughey's SDLP fails to attend sessions of the Northern Ireland Assembly, even though they hold 14 of the 78 seats.

"We feel it's futile to try and force an agreement in the Assembly, but we fought the initial elections in 1982 to maintain our mandate to represent the people. We don't attend the sessions because we'd only be humiliated on a daily basis, which would discredit ourselves and discredit politics," explained Haughey.

As a result, the party handles constituent work, dealing with the government on matters of housing and employment; and issues statements on every public issue.

Haughey hopes that his party will draw support from Irish-Americans with its policy of nonviolent political action as a means of change, and lessen American support for groups like the IRA.

"Americans would be surprised to know just how scanty the resources of the SDLP are," said Haughey.

He said that during his trip he has met with many Irish-American political leaders, including Speaker of the House Tip O'Neill, whom he said are "committed to our approach."

"They've taken a risk with their constituency and stood up to the extemists in this country," he said.

During his trip, Haughey has been trying to get the non-violent view across the media and the public. "We'd like to be able to come out here more often."

The ideal situation for Dennis Haughey, would be a government united with Dublin that would give the Unionists assurances through institutions and resources that they would have a secure place in the society. "I'd bend over backwards to ensure that they'd never fear in any way that they'd be injured or discriminated against," he said.

During his U.S. tour, Haughey visited Washington, D.C., New York, Boston, Minneapolis, San Francisco, New Orleans, and Jackson, Mississippi, where he was scheduled to meet with American civil rights activists.●

SENATE—Thursday, May 2, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, April 15, 1985)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Our prayer this morning will be offered by the Reverend Samuel N. Smith, First Church of the Nazarene, Washington, DC. He is the grandfather of Bill Blair, one of our pages, and is being sponsored by Senator MATHIAS.

PRAYER

The Reverend Samuel N. Smith, First Church of the Nazarene, Washington, DC, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Almighty God, our Father, sanctify unto Thyself this place and these leaders of our beloved land. Make Thy presence known and withhold not Thy grace nor mercies from us.

Protect us all from evil so that our very hearts will persistently hunger and thirst after righteousness. Let us remember with deepest care those who are hungry, persecuted, oppressed, or neglected.

Thou dost know the Members of this body who today carry personal burdens. May Thy grace be given to them according to their need.

Grant courage that we may come to You in boldness and confidence.

Grant humility that we might know child-like faith.

Grant integrity that we might live in obedience to Thy will.

Grant assurance that we can live the most turbulent of our days in joy and thanksgiving.

May we be continually conscious of Thy presence; responsive to Thy love; grateful for Your blessings; and faithful stewards of the privilege Thou hast granted to us.

Do grant Thy mercies upon this Nation that we may be found righteous in Thy sight. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each, unless that time is reserved by the leaders. That will be followed by special orders of 15 minutes each for Senators PROXMIRE, MATSUNAGA, COCHRAN, and EVANS. That would take us to around 11 o'clock. Then there will be routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 11:30 a.m., with statements limited to 5 minutes each.

Following that, we will return to the consideration of the Senate budget resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 32. The pending amendment is No. 46 dealing with defense reduction offered by myself for Senators GRASSLEY and HATFIELD. It would be my hope that we could vote on that amendment sometime early afternoon, then go to the so-called conforming amendment on COLA's for veterans, civil service retirees and military retirees, and at that point I would guess that we would be getting into the amendment process where things would move fairly rapidly.

At last count, there were 68 or 70 some amendments remaining. There are still about 27 hours remaining on the resolution. I would guess we would go fairly late this evening. For tomorrow, we will see what today brings before we make the final judgment, but I do anticipate rollcall votes tomorrow. So I would caution my colleagues of that. I know many have official plans elsewhere. We will try to accommodate those if we can. There will be no session on Saturday. I do anticipate rollcall votes on Monday.

On Tuesday, there are some conflicts and there may not be any votes after 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday. Then we hope to really wind this up not later than Wednesday or Thursday of next week. That is sort of a long-range view.

There are precisely 27 hours and 36 minutes remaining on the resolution. The majority has 11 hours 22 minutes and minority has 16 hours 14 minutes.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time and I reserve all the time for the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. SYMMS]. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it is my understanding that I have a special order for 15 minutes, is that right?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

THE PROSPECT OF A NUCLEAR ATTACK FROM THE USSR

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, each of us in this body must read literally thousands of editorials, columns, and articles every year that influence our attitude toward public policy. Some of these essays easily confirm our predilections; such articles usually have little or no influence on our decisions. They do however make us feel better. And they reinforce and harden our position. Some flatly contradict our prejudices and presumptions. They may move us to question our assumptions. They may make us feel a little less secure about our convictions that we have the only true answers. Many of these essays are very useful to us. They give us information, insight, understanding, a kind of continuing education that every Member of the Congress must have if he is to discharge his responsibility as a Member of the Congress in this preplexing, contradictory, and rapidly changing world.

Mr. President, if I were to pick one short piece to recommend to all Members of the Congress to read from the press of the past year, I would select a little article that appeared in the New York Times of December 9, 1984, entitled "Putting Up With the Russians" and written by a Britain who died in early December of last year, named Edward Crankshaw.

Why is this article so enlightening? And why do I think it is the most useful of the year for a Member of Congress? Here is an article that takes a hard, cold, clear look at the Soviet Union. It recognizes that—

> While the Bolshevik regime was even more vile than it was possible for anyone who had not experienced it to imagine, that although it would make mischief on every possible occasion and find it hard to resist every opportunity for easy expansionism and subversion, there is next to no danger of the Kremlin launching a formal war and it could always be stopped by a firm and clear declaration of the line it must not cross—backed by sufficient force to make that declaration credible.

Crankshaw deplores the panic fear of communism that so disfigured our country in the heyday of Senator Joe McCarthy and that today has distorted our foreign policy in Central America and provoked us into a nuclear overkill gone wild. Crankshaw argues that the Soviet Union's one great achievement has been turning itself into a bogey to give us an excuse to stop thinking.

For 24 years this Senator has served on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. Year after year in all those years the Defense Department officials have come before the committee with dire warnings of the growing military power of the Soviet Union and the necessity for our spending ever increasing billions to research, produce, and deploy a nuclear capability that piles endlessly increasing nuclear weapons on an arsenal that already could destroy the Soviet Union many times over even if they hit this country first with a highly successful preemptive first strike. Of course, it is true that the Soviet Union could totally devastate this country with a nuclear attack. But Crankshaw is right. They will not attack, because they know we can retaliate with at least as devastating a second strike totally destroying the Soviet Union. The two superpowers have reached a stand off, and yet the multibillion-dollar arms race careens along. Somehow we have developed the ridiculous notion that the Soviet Union has a military machine that, unless we arm feverishly, could sweep through Europe, overwhelm NATO and force the free world to surrender. How ridiculous, Mr. President!

For 5 long years the Soviet Union has been trying to pound weak, primitive, little Afghanistan into submission. It has moved in with its planes and tanks, its massive manpower and has even resorted to chemical weapons. Afghanistan is not some country distant from Russia separated by an ocean. It is a bordering nation. The Soviet supply lines are relatively short. Mr. President, if the mighty armed forces of the Soviet Union cannot bring Afghanistan to heel after 5 years without using nuclear weapons, what kind of threat do they pose to NATO let alone the United States? Sure, the Soviet Union has a nuclear arsenal they could use against NATO that they have not employed in Afghanistan. But to do so the Soviets would have to accept the certainty that they would be met with a devastating and totally destructive nuclear response. And they would also have to face the fact that their untried, untested nuclear arsenal is based on an ICBM force powered by highly unreliable liquid propellants. If arms technology teaches us anything, it is that untested systems work very badly and often do not work at all. Probably no military power in history has had more experience with new technologies that do not work than the Soviet Union. And few, if any, military powers have had a more consistent record of confining direct aggression to those weak and usually neighboring nations that they know they can intimidate. Under these circumstances, Edward Crankshaw is right in contending that there is next to no danger that the Kremlin will launch a formal war against NATO or the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have referred by Edward Crankshaw from the New York Times of December 9, 1984, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUTTING UP WITH THE RUSSIANS

Edward Crankshaw, who died last week, was Britain's most sober, and witty, analyst of the Soviet Union. For 40 years, he probed its mysteries and hostilities and set standards for journalism, looking past the games of Kremlinology to the central issues of coexistence.

"Putting Up With the Russians" is the title he chose for his last testament, a just-published collection of past essays. It's as fresh and instructive as the morning paper. His introduction, succinctly recapping the message he most wanted to leave, is quoted here with the permission of Viking-Penguin, Inc.:

The Soviet Union has to be treated not as a monstrous, unfathomable apparition to be contemplated helplessly, but as one country among others (with startling peculiarities, of course) and part of the general global mess. I wanted to show that while the Bolshevik regime was even more vile that it was possible for anyone who had not experienced it to imagine, that although it would make mischief on every possible occasion and find it hard to resist every opportunity for easy expansionism and subversion, there was next to no danger of the Kremlin launching a formal war and it could always be stopped by a firm and clear declaration of the line it must not cross—backed by sufficient force to make that declaration credible. . . .

We, and especially Washington, seem quite suddenly to have forgotten what we have learnt. There are disconcerting signs of a drift back to the old panic fear of the Communist menace, an ideological crusade and the more absurd attitudes of the cold war. There is a general loss of a sense of proportion. Nuclear overkill runs wild. An American President appears to see nothing demeaning in proclaiming to the world at large that the fate of his great, magnificent, rich and so powerful country depends on the outcome of this or that squalid civil war in Central America—and this after Cuba, 1962!

Many years ago I wrote that the Kremlin's one great achievement was turning itself into a bogy to give us an excuse to stop thinking. . . . Too often our politicians and soldiers have preferred wild speculation based on the unsupported proposition [about] a war of conquest with an eye to global hegemony. Further, even less excusably, they have taken at its face value the Kremlin's insistence on the monolithic unity of the Communist world—and by so doing succeeded in welding the very disparate parts more firmly together. . . .

There was and still is indeed a menace of sorts, and one to be taken seriously and quietly: our old friend Russian imperialism, given a new cutting edge by modern armaments and driven by a combination of fear and greed and a cockeyed political philosophy. Of course the Kremlin uses Communism as a stalking-horse, but it was Russia in arms, not Communism, which occupied half Europe in 1945. . . .

I have called it Putting Up With the Russians because that is what we have to do. The Soviet Union is a fact of life like the weather. We have to live with it. Soviet leaders go on about 'peaceful coexistence' as though it were an original idea they had dreamed up. It is not an idea at all. We do in fact coexist and will continue to do so whether we like it or not unless and until we blow ourselves off the face of the earth. The adjective 'peaceful' simply begs the question. . . . For us it means, or should mean, live and let live. For the Government of the Soviet Union it embraces the concept of an unceasing 'ideological struggle,' aiming at the salvation of humanity through the substitution, by all conceivable means short of war, of the Soviet political and social system for every differing system in every country on this planet—a process dignified by the name of World Revolution. It is impossible to tell how much or how little the Soviet leadership still believes this antiquated rubbish, but it is certainly influenced in its behavior by at least the habit of belief.

REFUGEES SIGNAL VIOLATIONS OF RIGHTS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a recent article in the Christian Science Monitor reported that thousands of refugees are continuing to flee from many countries. There are more than 9 million refugees in the world today who are seeking asylum. According to the article, they are fleeing because of fear of persecution in their homelands. Mozambique, Angola, Zimbabwe, and Vietnam are just a few of these homelands. Many also come from Latin America, Africa, Eastern Europe, Asia, and the Far East.

If the refugees are lucky enough to escape the brutality and persecution they fear at home, they still face a threat to their lives. Many are attacked and captured while fleeing and placed in refugee camps. Conditions in these camps are purposely kept austere to discourage other refugees from fleeing.

The United States has publicly criticized various countries for these violations of human rights. Specifically, the article mentioned our criticism of Ugandan brutality. This brutality and persecution continue to cause an outpouring of refugees from that country. Roger Winter, director of the U.S. Committee for Refugees, has stated that the "United States could and should speak up more forcefully when refugees are mistreated."

I believe Mr. Winter is right that we need to speak up more. We cannot be sure when attacks on refugees constitute a planned and determined effort to destroy a particular group of people. We are able to say the refugees are being denied rights to which all humans are entitled. The refugees are experiencing persecution, brutality, and are being denied their right to live in peace.

If we ratify the Genocide Treaty, we would show our disapproval of inhumane policies that threaten any people's survival. The refugees are threatened and are seeking other places to live. We must be able to criticize such injustice freely. The United States of America will be able to speak up more forcefully if we take action and ratify this world treaty.

The persecution and death of so many refugees constitute a great loss to humanity. Hitler's deliberate persecution of so many minorities was also a tremendous loss to humanity. Ratification of this treaty will allow us to take action freely and express our beliefs without fear of recrimination whenever a genocidal act occurs. I urge my colleagues to act upon this treaty now.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR COCHRAN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

HALEY BARBOUR

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I rise this morning to commend the President for his selection of a very talented friend and fellow Mississippian, Haley Barbour, to be special assistant to the President for political affairs. I know Haley Barbour will be a valuable member of the President's staff.

Since graduating from the University of Mississippi Law School in 1973, Haley's service to the Republican Party at both the State and national levels has been truly outstanding.

From 1973 to 1976, he served as executive director of both the Mississippi Republican Party and the Southern Association of Republican State Chairman.

Following the 1976 National Republican convention, President Ford selected Haley as his campaign director for the Southeastern States.

In 1978, I was fortunate to have him involved in my general election campaign for the Senate as chairman of my steering committee.

In 1982, Haley was the Republican nominee for the Senate, and 2 years later he was chosen to serve on the Republican National Committee.

His performance, Mr. President, in all of these jobs has been exemplary. At the same time, he has also achieved prominence as a practicing lawyer in Yazoo City, MS. He has earned the respect and admiration of his fellow citizens and his professional colleagues. He is a partner in the law firm of Henry, Barbour & de Cell. He has served as city attorney for Yazoo City and in 1980 was elected municipal judge.

He currently is a director of Deposit Guaranty Corp. and serves on the board of the Deposit Guaranty National Bank.

Mr. President, it will indeed be a pleasure for me and I think all other Senators to work with Haley Barbour in his new position of trust and responsibility on the staff of the President of the United States.

MHD ENERGY CENTER MISSISSIPPI STATE UNIVERSITY

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues the significant contributions being made by the MHD Energy Center at Mississippi State University in the field of magnetohydrodynamic [MHD] electric power generation.

In mid-May, scientists at the center will be traveling to the People's Republic of China by invitation to participate in a bilateral exchange of scientific research on magnetohydrodynamics. Both the United States and the People's Republic of China have been committed to the development of MHD as an economically efficient and environmentally safe method of producing electricity for the future.

The benefits for both countries from the bilateral exchange of scientific knowledge will be considerable. The United States has a long history of MHD research on a large scale, and major achievements have been made in such areas as the coal-fired combustor, the high performance generator channel, the super conducting magnet, heat recovery/seed recovery and optical diagnostic instrumentation development. The People's Republic of China has built the only complete pilot-scale MHD combined cycle steam powerplant in the world.

The MHD Energy Center at Mississippi State University is emerging as the acknowledged leader in the development of microprocessor-controlled optical diagnostic instrumentation for MHD power train data acquisition.

While the diagnostic systems developed at Mississippi State are being used on test facilities around the country, they have never been used to acquire necessary measurements such as combustion temperatures, slag surface temperatures, particle size and pollution emission levels on a complete MHD cycle steam powerplant such as the one available in the PRC.

The bilateral scientific exchange agreement, signed by the university, the MHD Energy Center, the U.S. Department of Energy, the U.S. Department of State, and the Shanghai Power Plant Equipment Research Institute in August 1983, calls for tests conducted by MHD Energy Center personnel on the Shanghai Power Plant Equipment Research Institute's MHD facility using the diagnostic instrumentation developed at Mississippi State University. The research developed will help provide the data base needed to commercialize MHD electrical power generation.

MHD, as a method for generating electricity, is extremely attractive because it is a very efficient two-stage high-temperature combustion process capable of producing approximately 50 percent more power from low-cost fuel, such as coal. Electricity is extracted in both stages, and more pollutants are burned off instead of being discharged into the atmosphere.

I commend the MHD Energy Center for its significant contributions to the development of this important technology and to Sino-American friendship and mutual understanding. I hope my colleagues will join me in extending our best wishes for a successful trip.

AMERICAN AGRICULTURE IN INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, today, leaders of the Western World are in Bonn discussing economic problems that confront all of us. One of the most serious situations that confronts our country today is the matter of the imbalance in our trade. In no sector of our economy is this more dramatically illustrated than in the agriculture area. In an effort to do something constructive to solve these agricultural trade problems that confront our country, I introduced yesterday, with my distinguished friend from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] a bill that is designed to make our agricultural products more competitive.

American agriculture's ecomonic potential is not being utilized. It has not shared in the economic recovery that has occurred to date in many other areas of our economy. Financial stress has resulted throughout the agriculture industry. I do not think many realize the extent to which the trade situation in argiculture has deteriorated just in the last several months. Let me give an example of some of the dramatic changes that have taken place just since the end of last year.

In December 1984, the Department of Agriculture was estimating that the dollar value of our trade would amount to about $36.5 billion. In February, they changed that estimate by reducing the figure to $35.5 billion. One month later, in March, they changed it again to $34.5 billion. These are estimates that are not, we hope, just taken out of thin air. They are based on what is truly happening in the international marketplace. So what is happening is that the effort by U.S. farmers and traders to move our commodities in overseas markets is grinding to a halt. Those efforts are not paying off. This is a dangerous situation, Mr. President, and I think it needs the immediate attention of the Senate.

This legislation that was introduced just yesterday is an emergency bill. It is based upon the notion that we cannot any longer tell all of the competitors we have around the world that we are going to peg our price at a certain loan rate which inevitably becomes a world market price so that they then can price their commodities just a little bit below the U.S. loan rate. Then, with the imbalance in the value of our currency, it becomes impossible for us to compete and to sell U.S. agricultural commodities. Because of this value of the dollar problem that is added to the other factor, we are seeing other countries having to pay a 35-percent higher price for U.S. products than for some products that are produced in neighboring countries.

Some wonder what we can do about it. I am suggesting that we use a new strategy called a marketing loan. That is the centerpiece of the bill that was introduced yesterday. It is the centerpiece of a bill I introduced on April 3, which is a farm bill that involves the entire range of provisions that would make up a farm bill for 1985. This marketing loan is singled out from the larger piece of legislation and introduced as a freestanding bill, because it is something that can be implemented right now to help us become more competitive.

These provisons, if enacted into law, would help bring higher farm prices so farmers can have a better return on their investment, and their labor, but it would lower the effective prices of crops and make them more competitive in world markets.

This is how it would work: Instead of having to forfeit the crop to the Commodity Credit Corporation at the end of the harvest, as is now the custom—if you cannot get on the open market what is the equivalent price of the loan rate, you forfeit the crop to the Commodity Credit Corporation. The Government then holds it, stores it, pays storage costs. That costs a lot of money. Now, under the marketing loan, the farmer can redeem his loan for either the loan rate or the market price, whichever is lower. This will force the sale of U.S.-produced commodities and make us again competitive in the international marketplace. The Government makes up the difference, but the Government does not have to pay the storage costs, it does not have to incur a lot of other expenses that are now a part of the income support structure for American agriculture. So I am hoping that Senators will look at this concept.

We put in the RECORD some questions and answers that are commonly asked about this strategy, and we hope that will prove to be helpful to Senators as they begin to review this proposal.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR MATSUNAGA

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Hawaii is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I thank the Chair.

S. 1053—LEGISLATION TO IMPLEMENT RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMISSION ON WARTIME RELOCATION AND INTERNMENT OF CIVILIANS

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, with my colleagues Senator INOUYE of Hawaii, Senators STEVENS and MURKOWSKI of Alaska, Senator CRANSTON of California, Senator MELCHER of Montana, Senator DENTON of Alabama, Senators GORTON and EVANS of Washington, Senators RIEGLE and LEVIN of Michigan, Senator PROXMIRE of Wisconsin, Senators KENNEDY and KERRY of Massachusetts, Senators MOYNIHAN and D'AMATO of New York, Senator BURDICK of North Dakota, Senator METZENBAUM of Ohio, Senator SARBANES of Maryland, Senator HART of Colorado, Senator HARKIN of Iowa, Senators BRADLEY and LAUTENBERG of New Jersey, Senator EXON of Nebraska, Senator SIMON of Illinois, and Senator HATFIELD of Oregon, I am today reintroducing legislation, S. 1053, which would carry out the recommendations of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians.

The distinguished nine-member study commission, chaired by Washington attorney Joan Bernstein, was established by Congress in 1980 to examine the facts surrounding the issuance of Executive Order 9066 and the subsequent relocation and incarceration of some 120,000 Americans and residents aliens of Japanese ancestry during World War II. In addition, the Commission was mandated by Congress to examine the circumstances surrounding the evacuation of the Aleutian Islands and the relocation of Native American Aleuts. The Commission submitted its final report to Congress, entitled "Personal Justice Denied," in June 1983 and, in November of that year, I introduced S. 2116, a bill very similar to the one being introduced today. S. 2116 was the subject of extensive hearings in 1984; however, it was not reported by committee or considered by the full Senate prior to adjournment of the 98th Congress.

The new bill, S. 1053, would provide a long overdue remedy for what has become known as one of America's worst wartime mistakes: The incarceration in detention camps of some 120,000 Americans and resident aliens of Japanese ancestry from the west coast.

About 80 percent of these evacuees were native-born Americans and the remaining 20 percent were their parents—first generation immigrants who were longtime legal residents of the United States prohibited by the Oriental Exclusion Act of 1924 from becoming naturalized American citizens. In the summer and early fall of 1942, long after the threat of an enemy invasion of the west coast had faded, they were summarily removed from their homes by U.S. Army troops attached to the Western Defense Command and sent to isolated detention camps, surrounded by barbed wire fences and armed guards, in the interior parts of this country. Without warrant, without trial or hearing, they were deprived of their personal freedom and lost their homes, farms, businesses and careers. Although the civil courts and law enforcement agencies were operating normally on the west coast, not a single one of the evacuees was ever charged or indicted for the commission of a crime, much less tried or convicted. All of them, native-born Americans and legal residents alike, were fully entitled to the protection of the United States Constitution, but their constitutional rights were summarily denied them by armed men acting under the dictates of their own Government.

This governmental action was unprecedented in American history, and in the years since the war, scholars and historians have asked "Why?" How could high-minded Americans abandon their most cherished ideals and rob fellow Americans of their inherent constitutional rights simply because they resembled our declared enemy in biological features.

The Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians, through its careful review of wartime records and its extensive public hearings, found the answers to some of these questions. It has confirmed what Americans of Japanese ancestry have always known: The evacuation of Japanese Americans from the west coast and their incarceration in what can only be described as American-style concentration camps was not justified by military necessity, but was the result of racial prejudice, wartime hysteria, and the failure of political leadership. Specifically, the Commission found that:

51-059 O-86-10 (Pt. 8)

First, Lt. Gen. John DeWitt, Commanding General of the Western Defense Command, recommended exclusion of Japanese Americans to the Secretary of War on the grounds that ethnicity (or race) determined loyalty.

Second, the Federal Bureau of Investigation [FBI] and members of Naval Intelligence, who had relevant intelligence responsibility, were completely ignored when they recommended that nothing more than careful surveillance of suspected individuals was necessary.

Third, General DeWitt relied heavily on local politicians rather than on informed military judgments in reaching his conclusions as to what actions were necessary, and politicians largely repeated the prejudiced, unfounded themes of anti-Japanese factions and interest groups on the west coast.

Fourth, no effective measures were taken by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to calm the citizenry of the west coast, or to publicly refute unfounded rumors of sabotage and fifth column activity during the Japanese attack at Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941.

Fifth, General DeWitt was temperamentally disposed to exaggerate the measures necessary to maintain security, and placed security far ahead of any concern for the liberty and constitutional rights of citizens.

Sixth, Secretary of War Stimson and Assistant Secretary of War John J. McCloy, both of whose views on race differed from those of General DeWitt, failed to insist on a clear military justification for the measures General DeWitt wished to take.

Seventh, Attorney General Francis Biddle, while contending that evacuation of the Japanese Americans was unnecessary, did not argue to the President that failure to make out a case of military necessity on the facts would render the exclusion constitutionally impermissible or that the Constitution prohibited exclusion on the basis of ethnicity, given the then prevailing facts on the west coast.

Eighth, those representing the interest of civil rights and civil liberties in Congress, the press, and other forums were either completely silent or even supported evacuation. Thus there was no effective opposition to the measures vociferously sought by numerous west coast special interest groups, politicians, and journalists.

Ninth, President Roosevelt, without raising the question to the level of Cabinet discussion or requiring careful review of the situation, and despite the Attorney General's arguments and other information before him, agreed with the Secretary of War that evacuation should be carried out.

In the light of these findings, the Commission concluded that a "grave injustice was done to American citizens and resident aliens of Japanese ancestry, who, without individual review or any probative evidence against them, were excluded, removed, and detained by the United States during World War II." In accordance with its mandate from the Congress, the Commission recommended certain remedies, including the following:

First, the establishment by Congress of a $1.5-billion fund which would be used, first, to provide a one-time per capita payment of $20,000 to each of the approximately 60,000 surviving persons of Japanese ancestry who were excluded from their places of residence, pursuant to the Federal Government's order.

Second, the establishment of a fund for humanitarian and public education purposes related to the wartime events. The remaining moneys in the $1.5-billion fund would be used for this purpose.

Third, the enactment of legislation which would officially recognize that a grave injustice was done to the evacuees and which would offer the apologies of the Nation for the wartime acts of exclusion, removal, and detention.

Fourth, the granting of Presidential pardons to individuals who were convicted of violating the wartime statutes imposing a curfew on American citizens strictly on the basis of their ethnicity and requiring ethnic Japanese to leave designated areas of the west coast to report to assembly centers.

Fifth, the "liberal review" by appropriate executive branch agencies of applications submitted by Japanese Americans for the restitution of positions, status or entitlements lost in whole or in part because of acts or events between December 1941 and 1945 (for example, the Department of Defense should be instructed to review cases of less than honorable discharge of Japanese American from the armed services during World War II).

Mr. President, as reported by the Commission, many who were either directly or indirectly involved in the mass evacuation and detention of Americans and resident aliens of Japanese ancestry during World War II have, since the war, acknowledged the wrong inflicted on the evacuees. President Roosevelt himself, in approving the induction of Japanese Americans into the U.S. Army, observed that "Americanism is a matter of the mind and heart—not of race or ancestry." Henry L. Stimson, then Secretary of War, recognized that "to loyal citizens, this forced evacuation was a personal injustice.'" Francis Biddle, then the Attorney General of the United States, expressed his belief that "the program was ill-advised, unnecessary and unnecessarily cruel." Milton Eisenhower described the evacuation and detention of Japanese Americans as "an inhuman mistake." The late Chief Justice Earl Warren, who had urged evacuation as Attorney General of California, stated, "I have since deeply regretted the removal order and my own testimony advocating it, because it was not in keeping with our American concept of freedom and the rights of citizens." Justice Tom C. Clark, who had been liaison between the Justice Department and the Western Defense Command, concluded, "Looking back on it today (the evacuation) was, of course, a mistake."

It is time the Congress, too, acknowledged the grave injustice inflicted by the Federal Government on Americans of Japanese ancestry during World War II. Passage of our bill would remove a blot on the pages of our Nation's history and it would remove a cloud which has hung over the heads of Japanese Americans since the end of World War II.

Mr. President, the bill also provides for the compensation of American-Aleuts who were forced to leave their homes in the Aleutian Islands and parts of Alaska during World War II.

In 1942, Native American Aleuts were evacuated from their ancestral homes in the Aleutian and Pribiloff Islands in Alaska, then a U.S. territory. Although the evacuation was necessary because of the threat of enemy attack, it was marked by poor planning and coordination, and the Aleuts lost most of their personal possessions. They were sent to makeshift camps including abandoned canneries and mines, and, due to a lack of adequate food, clothing and medical care, about 10 percent of the evacuees died. When they were finally allowed to return to the islands, they found that their homes and community buildings had, in many cases, been destroyed.

Mr. President, I strongly urge the favorable consideration of this bipartisan measure by Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD following the statements made by Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit 1.)

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues in offering legislation to implement the recommendations of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians.

The Commission was established pursuant to Public Law 96-317 and directed to review the facts and circumstances surrounding the relocation and internment of American Citizens and permanent resident aliens of Japanese ancestry during World War II, along with the facts and circumstances which led to the relocation and, in some cases, the detention of Aleut civilians during the same time period.

In discharging its congressional mandate, the Commission held 20 days of hearings, including 3 days of hearings in Alaska, and received the testimony of more than 750 witnesses. The Commission's staff and others conducted exhaustive research. They were able to document in irrefutable detail, from their research in the National Archives and elsewhere, the facts and circumstances of these events that occurred 40 years ago. In these remarks I will address the Aleut issues, as I understand that other Senators will address in separate remarks the tragic circumstances which led to the internment of thousands of loyal Americans of Japanese ancestry.

THE ALEUT PEOPLE

Mr. President, the Aleut people are Native Americans whose ancestors migrated from Asia about 10,000 years ago. They settled the lower Alaska peninsula and the Aleutian Islands, an archipelago that spans the North Pacific for 900 miles from the peninsula to Attu Island. The Aleut villages are among the oldest places of habitation on this continent—the village of Nikolski, for example, has been determined to have been occupied for more than 8,000 years.

Anthropologists have estimated that 10,000 people lived on the Aleutians when the islands were occupied by Russian traders in the 18th century. Their numbers were soon reduced by massacre and disease to less than 2,000. Today there are about 3,600 Americans of Aleut ancestry, and major efforts are being made within the Aleut community to preserve the culture and traditions of this unique people.

As Solicitor of the U.S. Department of the Interior in the Eisenhower administration, I became generally aware that the Aleut communities of the Aleutians and Pribilof Islands had suffered severe dislocation and losses during the World War II. There had been no press accounts of these events at the time—correspondence and information between Alaska and the lower-48 had been subject to censorship during the war.

Unlike the internment of Japanese-Americans, which was subject to widespread publicity, litigation, and public discussion, the Aleut relocation during the war was considered a local administrative inconvenience and scant attention was paid to its effect on the Aleut people outside the immediate area of the Aleutians and the relocation camps.

Mr. President, Congress at my request expanded the mandate of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians to include the specific treatment of the Aleuts in World War II. The findings of the Commission document the extreme hardships endured by the Aleuts, and the unjustified losses they sustained. The recommendations of the Commission include restitution for those losses—and restitution, along the line of these recommendations, is provided in the bill we introduce today.

EVACUATION OF ALEUT VILLAGES

After the conquest of Attu and Kiska Islands by Japanese forces in early June 1942, the evaucation of all Aleut villages on the Pribilof Islands and the Aleutian Islands west of Unimak Island was ordered by military authorities in Alaska. Approximately 900 Aleut civilians were evacuated in June and July 1942, and hurriedly relocated to temporary camps in southeastern Alaska.

While this evacuation suffered from poor planning and inadequate logistic support, the Commission determined that it was a rational wartime measure under the circumstances at the time. The Commission found that the Aleuts suffered extreme hardships in the camps. Housing, sanitation, and eating conditions in the camps were deplorable. There were repeated epidemics of disease, and at least 10 percent of those in the camps died. Medical care was wholly inadequate. The Government clearly failed to meet its responsibilities to those under its care.

On returning to their villages, the Aleuts found—after an absence of 2 to 3 years—that houses, churches, community centers, personal property, boats, and other possessions had been destroyed, converted to military use without compensation, or severely damaged. They lost most of their religious icons and family heirlooms. While some attempts were made, with severely limited funds, to provide restitution, the evidence shows without doubt that the Aleuts' losses were never fully compensated by the responsible agencies and officials.

COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

After evaluating the evidence, the Commission recommended five specific measures of restitution for Aleut losses during World War II. These include a trust to be established for the beneficial use of the six surviving Aleut villages subject to relocation and for the beneficial use of surviving Aleuts and their descendants; per capita payment to each surviving Aleut evacuee; the rehabilitation of churches and restoration of church property damaged or destroyed by U.S. forces in the Aleutians; the cleanup of wartime debris left on populated islands of the Aleutians; and the rehabilitation of Attu Island for Aleut ownership and use.

The bill we introduce today would make restriction substantially in accordance with the Commission's recommendations. It includes the $5 million trust as recommended. The authorization of appropriations for the rehabilitation of chuches and church property is established at $1,399,000, while the authorization for minimum cleanup of wartime debris on the Lower Alaskan Peninsula and the Aleutians is set at $15,000,000. Although the Corps of Engineers has estimated that more than $40 million would be required to accomplish the cleanup in 1985 dollars, the smaller amount is authorized only as a supplemental program to the ongoing work in the region. Currently the Department of Defense is working on the problem through funding to the Environmental Restoration Defense Account established in appropriations acts.

While the combination of the DOD effort now underway, and the supplemental program envisioned in this bill, will not completely restore the Aleutian region, it should be adequate to eliminate hazardous debris that threatens the health and safety of the people.

Mr. President, there are three substantive differences between the Commission's recommendations and the provisions of our bill. First, those eligible for per capita payment would include not only the survivors of the evacuation by U.S. forces, but also the surviving Attuans who were held in detention on Hokkaido Island, Japan. I am informed that these people number only five survivors today. Second, our bill provides per capita payment of $12,000 to each of the some 400–500 surviving Aleuts, instead of the recommended $5,000. The legislation includes this increase in per capita payment to reflect comparability with the treatment of the surviving Japanese American internees. Third, our bill provides bidding rights to be exercised by The Aleut Corporation in lieu of conveyance of Attu Island to the Aleut people. Attu Island was designated as wilderness in the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act, and therefore, is not appropriate for conveyance back to the Aleut people. The bidding rights would be exercised by The Aleut Corporation, without any preference over any other bidder, in the disposition of surplus Federal property by the General Services Administration.

Mr. President, title III of our bill, relating to the Aleuts, has been drafted in close consultation with the Aleut leadership and with the residents of the affected Aleut villages. I am pleased to join as a cosponsor and intend to work for rapid consideration of the bill by the committee of jurisdiction.

Mr. President, I ask for unanimous consent that a section-by-section summary of title III of the bill, relating to the Aleut issues, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY OF THE ALEUTIAN AND PRIBILOF ISLANDS RESTITUTION ACT

TITLE III—ALEUTIAN AND PRIBILOF ISLANDS RESTITUTION

Section 301—Short Title

This title may be cited as the "Aleutian and Probilof Islands Restitution Act."

Section 302—Definition

The definitions contained in this section are those required to implement the Commission's recommendations in accordance with this title for compensation of individual Aleuts, and the Aleut community generally, for their losses and other injustices suffered during World War II.

The term "affected Aleut villages" includes the six Aleut villages which were evacuated by U.S. forces in June and July, 1942, for relocation to temporary detention camps in remote regions of Southeastern Alaska. The term also includes the Aleut village of Attu, which was not rehabilitated for Aleut occupation or other productive use following liberation of Attu Island from Japanese forces and the repatriation of Attuan citizens from Japanese detention on Hokkaido Island, Japan.

The term "eligible Aleut" includes any Aleut who is living on the date of enactment of this Act and who, as a civilian, was relocated by authority of the United States from his or her home village to an internment camp, or other temporary facility or location, during World War II. The term also includes those Aleuts who were residents of Attu on the date of Japanese occupation of the Island, and who are living on the date of enactment of this Act.

Other terms requiring no elaboration in this summary are also defined.

Section 303—Aleutian and Pribilof Islands Restitution Fund

Section 303(a) establishes within the Treasury of the United States a Fund to be known as the "Aleutian and Pribilof Islands Restitution Fund." This Fund will be administered by the Secretary of the Treasury, and will consist of amounts appropriated to it under this title.

Under section 303(b), the Secretary is required to report to Congress annually on the financial condition of the Fund, and on the results of Fund operations during the preceding fiscal year. All such reports will be printed as House Documents of the session of Congress to which such reports are made.

Section 303(c) through (e) establishes procedures to be followed by the Secretary in managing the assets of the Fund. The interest on any obligations held by the Fund, along with other proceeds from the sale of any obligations, will be credited to and form a part of the Fund.

Section 303(f) provides for the orderly termination of the Fund after the Secretary has accomplished the purposes of the Fund, as set out in other sections of the title. On the date the Fund is terminated, all amounts remaining in the Fund shall be deposited in the miscellaneous receipts account in the Treatury of the United States.

Section 304—Expenditures and Audit of Fund

Section 304(a) provides that the Secretary shall pay to the Administrator of certain specified Aleut restitution programs, as provided in appropriations acts, such sums from the Fund as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

Under section 304(b), authority is established for audits of the activities of the Administrator by the General Accounting Office, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Comptroller General.

Section 305—Administration of Certain Fund Expenditures

The detailed procedure for designation of the Administrator is established in section 305(a). Under the terms of the section, the Aleutian/Pribilof Islands Association, a nonprofit regional corporation organized under the laws of the State of Alaska for the benefit of Aleuts in the Aleut region, is designated by Congress as Administrator, subject to the terms and conditions of this title.

As soon as practicable after enactment, the Secretary of the Treasury will offer to undertake negotiations with the Association leading to execution of an Agreement setting forth the duties of the Association as Administrator. Any such Agreement entered into with the Association shall be approved by a majority of the Board of Directors of the Association. Independent annual audits of the Association's activities as Administrator are required, and a report of each such audit will be transmitted to the Secretary and to the Committees on the Judiciary of the House and Senate. Upon 30 days notice, under the terms of the required Agreement, the Secretary may terminate the Association's designation as Administrator for good cause shown.

Section 305(b) requires the Secretary of the Treasury to submit to Congress, within 15 days after approval by the parties, the Agreement specified in section 305(a). If the Secretary and the Association fail to reach an agreement within the 60 day period established for negotiations, the Secretary shall notify Congress within 75 days after enactment of such failure to reach agreement. In such circumstances, Congress would have the option of designating another Administrator, or of taking any other appropriate and necessary legislative action.

Section 305(c) provides that the Secretary shall make no expenditures to the Administrator from the Fund until Congress has reviewed for 60 days the Agreement required by section 305(a).

Section 306—Duties of the Administrator

Section 306(a) provides that, out of payments made from the Fund to the Administrator by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Administrator shall make restitution (as provided elsewhere in this section) for certain Aleut losses sustained in World War II, and shall take such other action as may be required by this title.

Section 306(b) directs the Administrator to establish a trust, organized under the laws of the State of Alaska, for the beneficial use of affected Aleuts and affected Aleut communities. This subsection parallels the first recommendation of the Commission for compensation of the Aleuts for losses sustained in World War II.

The principal amount of the trust established under this subsection shall be $5,000,000. It will be governed by not more than seven trustees, appointed by the Administrator from lists of prospective trustees submitted by each affected Aleut village. The trust will be apportioned into eight independent accounts. One account will be established for the independent benefit of the wartime Aleut residents of Attu and their descendants; one account will be established for the independent benefit of each of the six surviving Aleut villages evacuated by U.S. forces; and one account will be established for the independent benefit of those Aleuts who, determined by the trustees, are deserving but who will not benefit directly from the other seven accounts.

Five per centum of the principal amount of the trust will be credited initially to the latter account referenced above. The remaining principal amount will be apportioned among the other seven accounts, in proportion to the wartime population of the village for which each such account is established, as compared to the wartime population of all affected Aleut villages.

The purposes of the trust are outlined in section 306(b)(2). In general, the section authorizes the trustees to use the interest and other earnings from the trust to benefit the elderly, the disabled, the seriously ill, students in need of scholarships, and others in comparable circumstances. Additionally, the section provides that trust earnings my be used to preserve Aleut culture and historical records, to establish community centers in affected villages, and to take such other action as the trustees may determine will improve the condition of Aleut life.

Section 306(c) authorizes the Administrator to rebuild, restore, or replace churches or church property damaged or destroyed in affected Aleut villages during World War II. This subsection is consistent with the third recommendation of the Commission for compensation of Aleuts for losses sustained as a direct result of U.S. governmental actions during World War II.

Under the terms of this subsection, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay $100,000 from the assets of the Fund to the Administrator within 15 days after expenditures from such Fund are authorized by this title. The Administrator is required to use this payment to make an inventory and assessment of all churches and church property damaged or destroyed in affected Aleut villages during World War II. In addition the Administrator will use the payment to develop specific recommendations and detailed plans for reconstruction, restoration and replacement work to be accomplished on churches and church property.

The inventory and assessment, together with the specific recommendations and detailed plans, shall be submitted within one year after enactment to a review panel composed of the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, the Chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts, and the General Services Administrator. If the review panel has not disapproved the Administrator's plans and recommendations within 60 days, such plans and recommendations will be implemented as soon as practicable by the Administrator. If any part of the plans and recommendations are disapproved, the Administrator shall revise and resubmit such part to the review panel as soon as practicable.

In the event of irreconcilable differences between the Administrator and the review panel in respect of any part of the plans and recommendations, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to submit such part to Congress, for approval or disapproval by Joint Resolution.

Under the terms of section 306(c)(3), the Administrator is required to give preference to the Aleutian Housing Authority as general contractor for work to be performed in implementing the plans and recommendations for reconstruction, restoration, or replacement of churches and church property.

This section authorizes appropriations to the Fund adequate to carry out the purposes of the section, including $1,399,000 to carry out the church rehabilitation program under section 306(c). In addition, section 306(d) authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the Administrator, not less often than quarterly, for all necessary and reasonable administrative and legal expenses incurred in carrying out its functions under this title.

Section 307—Individual Compensation of Eligible Aleuts

Section 307(a) authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to make per capita payments out of the Fund to eligible Aleuts, as defined, for uncompensated personal property losses and for other purposes. The subsection requires a payment of $12,000 to each of approximately 400 individual Aleuts who are living on the date of enactment of this Act and who are the survivors of the relocation experience during World War II. All such per capita payments shall be made within one year after enactment of this Act, and shall not be considered income for purposes of any Federal taxes or for the purposes of determining eligibility for or the amount of any benefits or assistance under any Federal program or under any State or local program financed in whole or in part with Federal funds. This section addresses the second recommendation of the Commission for compensation of Aleut losses during World War II.

Under section 307(a) (2) and (3), the Secretary of the Treasury may require the assistance of the Attorney General in locating eligible Aleuts, and the Administrator shall assist the Secretary in identifying and locating eligible Aleuts for the purpose of the section.

Section 307(b) authorizes appropriations to the Fund adequate to make the per capita payments required by the section for restitution of heretofore uncompensated Aleut wartime losses.

Section 308—Supplemental Cleanup of Wartime Debris

Section 308(a) recognizes the on-going program for the removal of wartime debris from the Aleutian and Pribilof Islands region. This on-going program is administered by the Department of Defense through appropriations to the Department's Environmental Restoration Defense Account. The supplemental cleanup program authorized by this section, therefore, shall be exercised only in the event that such Account is inadequate to eliminate hazardous military debris from populated areas of the Lower Alaskan Peninsula and the Aleutian Islands.

Section 308(b) authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers, to plan and carry out a supplemental program for the removal and disposal of live ammunition, obsolete and abandoned buildings, abandoned machinery, and other hazardous debris remaining in populated areas of the lower Alaskan peninsula and the Aleutian Islands as a result of military activity during World War II. This section is consistent with the fourth recommendation of the Commission.

Section 308(c) provides that the debris removal program shall be the "Minimum Cleanup," as recommended by the Alaska District, Corps of Engineers, in its report dated October 1976. In carrying out the program, the Chief of Engineers is required to consult with the trustees of the trust established in section 306(b), and is further required to give preference to the Aleutian Housing Authority as general contractor.

Section authorizes $15,000,000 to be appropriated to carry out the purposes of this section.

Section 309—Attu Island Restitution Program

Section 309(a) recognizes that Attu Island, recommended by the Commission for conveyance to appropriate Aleut corporate entities, has been designated as wilderness by section 702(1) of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. As alternative restitution for the loss of traditional Aleut lands and village properties on Attu Island, compensation shall be made to the Aleut people in accordance with this section.

Section 309(b) directs the Secretary of the Treasury to establish an account designated The Aleut Corporation Property Account, which shall be available for the purpose of bidding on surplus Federal property. The initial balance shall be an amount reflecting the equivalent of $500 per acre for each of the 35,737 acres traditionally occupied and used by the Aleut people on Attu Island—or the equivalent of $17,868,500.

Under procedures established in this subsection, The Aleut Corporation may bid, by using the credits in the Account, as any other bidder for surplus Federal property, wherever located, in accordance with the requirements of section 484 of title 40, United States Code. In using the bidding rights established by this section, no preference will be given by the General Services Administration to The Aleut Corporation.

In addition to the bidding rights established as compensation for The Aleut Corporation in this section, subsection (h) provides that the Secretary of the Interior may convey to the Corporation, as provided under current law, the traditional Aleut village site on Attu Island. This authority is reflected under current law at section 1613(h)(1) of title 43, United States Code. The subsection limits selections under section 1613(h)(1), however, following date of enactment of this act, to such traditional village site on Attu Island and no other site on such Island.

Section 310—Separability of Provisions

This section provides that if any provision of this title, or the application of any provision to any person or circumstance, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this title or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues in introducing legislation in the 99th Congress to implement the findings of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians. Few changes have been made in this legislation since November of 1983, when it was first introduced in the Senate.

As most of my colleagues are aware, the Commission was established pursuant to Public Law 96-317 to study the facts and circumstances surrounding the evacuation and internment of thousands of American citizens and resident aliens of Japanese ancestry during World War II. In fulfilling its congressional mandate, the Commission conducted extensive hearings throughout the country in addition to exhaustive archival research over a 3-year period. In its final report entitled "Personal Justice Denied," the Commission concluded that there was no justification for the mass evacuation, relocation, and internment of 120,000 Japanese-American citizens and resident aliens.

Instead, the Commission found that the decision to intern was made solely on the basis of ethnicity, not for any valid military or security reasons. Fear and prejudice obstructed our commitment to uphold the constitutional rights of our people, and as a result, thousands of lives were disrupted immeasurably. The Commission concluded that the Japanese-American case is unique in the constitutional history of our country in that there was a total abrogation of constitutional guarantees inflicted against a single group of citizens and resident aliens solely on the basis of ethnicity.

Based on these findings that concluded that a grave injustice was done to American citizens and resident aliens of Japanese ancestry, who were excluded, removed and detained by the U.S. Government without benefit of individual review, the Commission recommended remedies which comprise the legislation we are introducing today.

In brief, the Commission recommended the establishment of a trust fund from which individual payments to the surviving internees would be made. The remainder would be used for humanitarian and public education purposes in order to preclude this event from occurring again in the future.

Second, the Commission advised the enactment of legislation to officially recognize the injustice that was committed and offer the apologies of the Nation for the evacuation, relocation, and detention.

Third, the Commission recommended the granting of pardons to those who were convicted of violating wartime statutes relating to forced curfews and evacuation on the basis of ethnicity; and finally, a liberal review of individual cases for the restitution of positions, status, or entitlements lost as a result of the evacuation, relocation, and internment.

The Commission made its recommendations after serious and thoughtful deliberation, and on the basis of what they felt to be the just and proper solution, not necessarily what was politically and economically expedient. We should keep in mind that the monetary payment to surviving internees represents a symbolic effort to redress a grave infraction of civil liberties. The actual loss incurred by those who suffered this injustice at the hands of their own Government, is immeasurable.

We must act quickly on this legislation to deter an event as reprehensible as the internment experience from happening again, as silence on the issue has the danger of appearing as tacit acceptance. I am proud to be a cosponsor of this measure, and I look forward to working with my colleagues to pass a bill this session.

I ask unanimous consent that the following article from the April 28 issue of the New York Times Magazine be printed in the RECORD. Although I was fortunate enough not to have been interned, I visited a camp in Rohwer, AR, and remember being aghast that such a place could exist in America. Mr. Oishi's article is an excellent first-hand view of what it was like to be Japanese-American and interned during World War II.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ANXIETY OF BEING A JAPANESE-AMERICAN

(By Gene Oishi)

My base camp was the Hyatt Regency Hotel, an imposing fortresslike structure towering above downtown Phoenix. My room on the 12th floor looked south over the desert, dotted with flat-topped buttes that looked like bombed-out Mount Fujis. Somewhere out there was the site of the Gila River Relocation Center, the internment camp in which I spent an important part of my childhood during World War II.

As I looked out over the desert from my well-appointed hotel room I could feel traces of a nagging fear, and I began to sense why it had taken me nearly 40 years to revisit the scene of my wartime internment.

It was last April that I made the trip to Arizona, ostensibly to complete my research for an article dealing with the assimilation of Japanese into the American mainstream. Actually, I went there in the hope of overcoming a writer's block.

Much has been written about the internment of Japanese during World War II, and so I had not intended to dwell on that aspect of Japanese-American history. But as I began to write the article, it became clear to me that there was much more that needed to be said about the experience.

I recalled the hearings held in 1981 by the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians. The commission was created by Congress, in the wake of renewed demands for reparations, to re-examine the internment of Japanese during World War II. Hundreds of Japanese came forth to testify, and many feel that those hearings constituted the most significant event that has occurred in the Japanese community since the internment itself.

The commission concluded its work in the summer of 1983 with a list of five recommendations, including one that calls for a $1.5 billion fund to be used to provide a one-time compensatory payment of $20,000 to each of the approximately 60,000 remaining survivors of the internment. There was a bill in the last Congress—and action on a reintroduced version is expected in the current session—that would implement the commission's recommendations. Regardless of the fate of that bill, the commission hearings had a permanent impact on the Japanese community.

At the hearings, the usually reticent and undemonstrative nisei—second-generation Japanese-Americans—choked back tears or let them flow as they told their stories. Many of the spectators wept, too, as they listened, and it seemed as if a dam had burst and the community was at long last truly mourning its past. The sansei—third-generation Japanese-Americans, most of whom were too young to have experienced the internment—were astonished. "I never saw nisei act that way before," said a sansei afterward.

It was not what the witnesses said that was so remarkable, for most of them simply described the economic and physical hardships they endured. What was remarkable was that they spoke at all. I, too, spoke to the commission at a pre-hearing briefing seminar in June 1981. My throat and chest suddenly felt so constricted that I thought I was coming down with an attack of bronchitis. It took all the strength I had to get through my talk and to keep from breaking into tears.

The reasons for the severity of my reaction, and that of the other witnesses, long remained a mystery to me. Even in the spring of 1983, when I traveled around the country interviewing Japanese of all ages and in a wide variety of occupations, I had not yet plumbed the emotional depths of the internment experience. Nor did I start out with the intention of doing so. My plan was to flesh out what social scientists had been saying for the last two decades: that Japanese-Americans are an extraordinarily successful ethnic group.

As a group (there are about 700,000 Japanese in the United States), they are for the most part prosperous, well-educated and are rapidly joining the mainstream of middle-class life. But in the course of my interviews I began to notice in myself as well as in those I interviewed an intense discomfort with the "model minority" theme.

Chris Iijima, a teacher and politically oriented folk singer in New York, first articulated this discomfort for me in a rational way. Every stereotype, he said, has a "flip side." Hard-working can become ruthless. Resourceful and ingenious can become diabolical. Friendly can become sneaky. Dedicated can become finatical. What Iijima said struck a chord in me, for within my own lifetime I have seen the Japanese stereotype among the American public turn from negative to postive, and there are signs that as a result of economic competition with Japan it might flip again as more Americans view Japan as a threat to their livelihood.

Later, as I thought about Iijima's observation and my reaction to it, I began to understand that the reason for my near-breakdown before the Congressional commission was fear. I was speaking to a commission that represented in my mind the same type of officialdom that in 1942 could not see past the color of our skin and hair and the shape of our eyes and noses and concluded that we were actual or potential enemies.

It was in Arizona, at the scene of my wartime internment, that I began to suspect that our discomfort with stereotypes, even positive ones, was rooted in fear. For the first time, I began to get a sense of how fear had ruled much of my life and perhaps the lives of most Japanese of my generation.

I was surprised by the ease with which I found the old campsite in the Gila River Indian Reservation, about 30 miles south of Phoenix. The barracks were gone, but the concrete foundation blocks, with twisted and rusted steel flanges clinging to them, were still there, as were the large slabs of concrete that once were the floors of the mess halls. From the top of a butte I had often climbed as a child, I could see a cattle farm and greening fields of wheat in the distance. None of this had existed when I first was here. At that time, there was nothing but desert wilderness as far as the eye could see. I felt high indignation; they were ruining my desert, encroaching on that previous isolation that had provided a measure of safety for me as a child. I realized then that I had not wanted to leave the camp. The desert, with its primitive desolation and extremes of weather, can be frightening at times, but it was not as frightening to me as the uncertainties and ambiguities of the world from which I had been ejected.

For the first nine years of my life my home had been Guadalupe, a small farming community in California's Santa Maria Valley. My father, who was a prominent farmer and civic leader in the Japanese community, was arrested early in the morning on Dec. 8, 1941, within 24 hours after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. Though he was never charged with any crime, he thought he was going to be executed and so he wrote a letter of farewell to his family from a cell in the Santa Barbara County Jail.

Although my father and other community leaders arrested with him were not killed, many of the older Japanese feared they were being sent to extermination camps as the general "evacuation" began on the West Coast several months later. These fears I learned of much later, but I got a hint of them at the time from my mother's perpetually furrowed brow, from the sound of her crying at night and from her hair, which seemed to have turned gray overnight.

The roots of the fear went back to the late 19th century, when Japanese first started coming to this country in significant numbers. Like the Chinese before them, Japanese were subjected to intense racial hatred and vilification. Every effort was made to keep them from becoming woven into the social and economic fabric. They were not allowed naturalization privileges. Most Western states passed laws forbidding Asians from owning land. Antimiscegenation and other racially discriminatory laws were enacted. There was pressure put on Congress to stop further immigration from the Far East. In 1882, immigration from China was stopped, and in 1924 the ban was extended to Japan.

With the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, racial animosity flared with renewed ferocity. It was a time when racism was not universally condemned as it is today publicly, and members of Congress and newspaper columnists and editors openly expressed racial hatred for the Japanese. Ultimately, in February 1942, President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed Executive Order 9066, which enabled the Government to remove 110,000 Japanese—71,000 of them American citizens—from the West Coast and to place them in internment camps in the interior.

The first camp we were sent to was an "assembly center" built at the county fairgrounds in Tulare, Calif. My memories are of heat, dust and a pervasive, sickening smell of the tar paper with which the barracks were covered. There were two barbed-wire fences surrounding the camp. This was not simply an "assembly center"; it was a prison. Soldiers with fixed bayonets patrolled the area between the two fences, and if you had any further doubts about what this camp was, there were guard towers along the perimeter, each equipped with a machine gun and searchlight.

Tulare was a hateful place, and I suppose anyone who spent time there would find his own reasons for finding it so. Mine never had any coherent pattern. First of all, my mother got sick and I had the feeling that she had deserted me. The food tasted tinny, maybe because it was served on metal trays. Juices from the canned vegetables, canned frankfurters and melting Jell-O flowed together to form a tepid, mildly sweet soup. The latrines were dirty and smelly and swarmed with flies. I still have unpleasant dreams about toilets filled and smeared with human feces. The barracks were crowded and noisy. Our family of six was assigned one small compartment that was barely large enough to hold our cots. The couple in the next compartment were always quarreling, and you could hear every word, even those they whispered.

During the day, I roamed with a band of children who resembled a pack of domestic dogs gone wild. We tried to make friends with the soldiers patrolling the camp, but they were sullen, even a little hostile, so we gave up. I don't know about the other children, but I never held it against the soldiers. Instead, I began to resent the Japanese they were guarding.

The camp in Arizona had no fence. None was needed, situated as we were in the middle of the wilderness. I recall being inordinately afraid of rattlesnakes. I was afraid to go out of the barracks at night for fear that one would come slithering out of the crawl space under the building. It is only in recent years that I have begun to realize that the state of panic in which I lived during the first few months in Arizona was in some way connected with being a Japanese. At the weekly movie, an American war film played that ended with the sinking of a Japanese battleship. As American bombs began exploding on the deck of the ship, Japanese sailors began to panic and leap into the sea. The children and young adults in the audience began to giggle, and as the battleship sank they broke into cheers and applause. I cheered and applauded, too, knowing full well that our parents in the crowd were deeply pained that their children were turning against Japan and perhaps even against them. By late 1943, those who had pledged their loyalty to the United States were allowed to leave. Most of those who remained were children—or older folk who had been born in Japan and who, under the law, were not allowed to become citizens. They knitted, sculptured ironwood, grew morning glories, built rock gardens, or sat in the shade, fanning themselves and squinting against the heat. Life remained pretty much that way until the war ended and we were told to leave.

I recall the first words spoken to me when I met a former schoolmate upon our return to Guadalupe. He had been a friend before the war and I had often gone to his house to play. "Hi, Norman," I said. "Remember me? I'm Gene." Norman stared for some time. I waited for a smile of recognition that never came. Instead, he titled his head back a little and asked with a sniff, "All you Japs coming back?"

I eventually got over Norman's rude welcome. I graduated from high school, served in the Army, went to college, got married to a Swiss woman, moved to the East Coast and began a career as a newspaper reporter. I lived in a white neighborhood, had white friends and for long stretches of time would forget I was Japanese. I would feel extremely uncomfortable when inevitably I would be reminded of it.

For years I thought I was unusual in my reactions, but as I interviewed Japanese around the country, I discovered I was more typical than not of the generation of so-called nisei who grew up in the 1930's and 40's and were interned with their immigrant parents.

Dwight Chuman, a Los Angeles journalist and sansei, or third-generation Japanese, called the nisei "confused young men who succeeded by selling their self-hatred and disappearing into the mainstream mentality." It is difficult to be lectured by a member of the younger generation, but I found myself agreeing with Chuman and with most of the sansei activists I interviewed.

Feelings of self-hatred and shame are well documented among victims of aggression and abuse, such as raped women, abused children and prisoners of war. But until recently, I had not thought of myself as a victim and had not allowed myself to feel fear or anger about the internment. As I interviewed Japanese around the country, I found others who were better able to articulate their feelings.

Bebe Toshiko Reschke, a psychiatric social worker at an adult outpatient clinic in California, was a child during the internment. She recalled that while in camp three military policemen came into her family's compartment to search for contraband.

"I had such a feeling of being violated," she said. "I still have a problem with that, of trusting authority . . . That anyone can have such control over you, and it can happen so fast."

"When I read these stories dealing with Japan," she continued, referring to coverage of Japanese competition with the United States, "I still get that emotional reaction. I think, 'Oh my God, the American public is turning against us again.' This time I'm not going. That's my line. This time I'm going to fight. I've joined the American Civil Liberties Union. That's my way of coping with my fears about what happened."

Her comment is an indication of the anger suppressed by many nisei that is only now beginning to bubble to the surface. The more fortunate Japanese-Americans, in my view, are those who in one way or another expressed their anger at the time. Minoru Yasui, a lawyer and former executive director of the Denver Community Relations Commission, is one of them.

A trim elegant man with a lively twinkle in his eyes, Yasui does not strike one as a stubborn fighter. In fact, as a young lawyer in Portland, Ore., in 1942, he had no intention of turning himself into a test case. "But we couldn't find anyone else to do it," he said. "You were laying your career, your life, your record on the line. . . . It was scary. If you were convicted, you didn't know whether you were going to come out of prison alive."

Despite his fear, Yasui refused to obey a curfew imposed on Japanese-Americans after the outbreak of World War II and refused to leave his home voluntarily when ordered to evacuate. He was arrested and served nine months in the Multnomah County Jail in Portland. Yasui appealed his conviction all the way to the Supreme Court, which upheld it.

Yasui and others who fought for their constitutional rights in court were the exceptions. The Japanese American Citizens League, which assumed leadership within the Japanese community in 1942, discouraged even legal challenges and urged cooperation with the authorities. After an initial protest, league leaders accepted the position of the authorities that the evacuation of all Japanese from the West Coast was a military necessity. They cooperated with the authorities in getting Japanese into camps. Once they were there, the league lobbied Washington successfully to allow nisei to volunteer for the armed forces and to be subject to the draft. At one point, Mike Masaoka, a league leader, was reported to have urged the formation of an all-Japanese "suicide battalion." Masaoka today says he does not recall having used the words "suicide battalion," and goes on to say that even if he had he did not have in mind anything like the kamikaze units formed later in the war by the Japanese enemy.

Passions were whipped raw during the first months of internment. In some camps, Japanese American Citizens League leaders were attacked and beaten. But on the whole, the league position was supported. About 75 percent of Japanese-American males responded "yes" to a loyalty questionnaire that made them subject to the draft. Ultimately, more than 33,000 Japanese-Americans, including women, volunteered or were drafted into the armed forces during the war. In the Pacific, they served as interpreters and translators; and in Europe, the all-Japanese 100th Battalion and the 442d Regimental Combat Team were two of the most decorated and bloodied units of the war.

Thus, Japanese in the United States paid with blood the price of acceptance as Americans. But there are many of us who feel that we are continuing to pay a price.

Amy Iwasaki Mass, a nisei who is a clinical social worker and an instructor at Whittier College, in Whittier, Calif., has worked with many nisei as a therapist and concludes that the internment experience continues to be "a real attack on our sense of well being and our self esteem."

The reaction of many nisei, she said, was much like that of some hostages who start to identify with their captors. "Identification with the aggressor makes us feel safer and stronger," she said.

She observed, as others have, that some nisei have shed their ethnic identity and have merged into the white mainstream. "What is sacrificed is the individual's own self-acceptance," she said. "It places an exaggerated emphasis on surface qualities, such as a pleasant nonoffensive manner, neat grooming and appearance, nice homes, nice cars and well behaved children."

A further misfortune, she said, is that many nisei have passed on their basic insecurity to their sansei children.

Some Sansei, however, have managed to break out of such a nisei mold. One of them is Steve Nakajo, a familiar figure on the streets of San Francisco's Japantown. His generous girth decked out in jeans and sneakers, he walks the streets with a swagger reminiscent of a sumo wrestler. He founded Kimochi Inc. to help the people of Japantown. One of the first projects was a movie escort service. Sansei, wearing yellow and black happi coats, walked or drive issei—first-generation immigrants—to and from Japanese movie theaters. This proved to be a popular service because of the old people's fear of street crime. Later, the Kimochi (which means "feeling") Lounge was opened, where issei could congregate, find reading materials, take up handicrafts and receive counseling for social services. A nutrition program was started as part of the federally financed meal program. Kimochi's crowning achievement, so far, is a $1.3 million, 20-bed facility for elderly Japanese. It was built entirely with private contributions, mostly from individuals, but with some corporate and foundation grants.

There are those who say that the internment benefited the Japanese by dispersing them throughout the country and making them more familiar and acceptable to other Americans. Such people ignore the damage done to the Japanese sense of family and to generational ties that sansei like Nakajo are trying to restore.

I am one of those whose trauma was real, and in recent years I have struggled with the thought of my father's humiliation and downfall. After coming to this country in 1903 at the age of 19, he established himself as a successful farmer in Guadalupe. A flamboyant man, he drove a big Buick, wore tailored suits, smoked cigars and sent two sons to Stanford University. With his arrest by Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and the internment of his family, he lost everything he had worked for and achieved in 40 years.

When we returned to Guadalupe after the war, he and my mother went to work as field laborers. Contrary to the Japanese stereotype, my father was a man who freely vented his feelings. A devotee of the Kabuki theater, he would be moved to tears by tales of death, sacrifice and downfall. Yet he never complained about his own economic ruin and loss of status. He carried on as if none of that really mattered. It is only in recent years, long after his death, that I have grown to appreciate his courage and to understand that if the authorities indeed wanted to emasculate him, they did not succeed. When I am able to accept that, perhaps my long night of fear will finally come to and end.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am delighted to support the legislation introduced today by my very good friend from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA] for redress of one of our Government's greatest acts of injustice.

As we look back with regret on this painful period of injustice—43 years ago—we must reaffirm our pledge that this kind of injustice must never recur.

Enactment of this legislation will help to prevent a recurrence.

And it will help us to look forward with hope to a brighter future of full participation by Asian Americans in the American dream.

My involvement in opposing the relocation of Japanese Americans dates back to the very beginning.

I believe that our Government's action in this case was a terrible affront to the ideals for which our Nation stands.

Shortly after Pearl Harbor, I was assigned to the Office of War Information. There I worked closely with Eleanor Roosevelt and Archibald MacLeish trying to dissuade President Roosevelt from forcefully evacuating Japanese-Americans from the west coast and interning them in so-called relocation camps.

Unfortunately for 120,000 Japanese-Americans—and for the good name of our Nation—military authorities prevailed, and the orders for internment were issued.

More than two-thirds of the internees were American citizens. The rest were legal U.S. residents.

After the internment process began, I visited two of the camps, Tule Lake in California and Heart Mountain, WY. Recently, the children of internees visited Heart Mountain trying to sense what their parents had felt. In part, I can tell them.

For 4 days in the cold, snow-covered camp at Heart Mountain, I spent my time round the clock inside the barbed-wire camp, talking to internees and visiting with a number of boyhood friends from Los Altos.

We ate meals together, talked over old times, walked around in the bitingly cold weather, played poker—in wanton violation of camp rules—and cheered at a football rally.

My friends and former classmates justifiably felt themselves robbed of their citizenship. They were distressed at the racial prejudice behind their internment. They were anxious for their Government to prove its own adherence to democracy and to the very ideals for which we were then at war.

President Roosevelt himself proclaimed, "In vindication of the very ideals for which we are fighting this war it is important to us to maintain a high standard of fair, considerate and equal treatment for the people of this minority as for all other minorities."

But this standard was not upheld.

The mere presence of Japanese blood in loyal American citizens was believed to be enough to warrant removal and exclusion from places they otherwise had a right to go.

The argument that they were removed for their own good, because of possible vigilante attacks, was not persuasive. Most, if not all, Japanese Americans would rather have faced the risk of being killed by individuals than deprived of their liberties by their own American Government. And given the choice to remain interned or fight in the war, most enlisted and served.

One of my most poignant memories is of an intelligent and progressive-minded mother who was still managing—with much difficulty—to conceal from her 4-year-old that they were prisoners in what most inmates considered a racial internment camp.

It was ironic to see American Nisei soldiers, home on furlough and clad in uniform, wandering around inside a fenced-in camp. These Nisei soldiers returned from the battlefields of Europe as the most distinguished and decorated combat unit of the war, and from the Pacific theater as loyal soldiers and as officers in military intelligence. I have never forgotten these impressions.

In 1980, I was cosponsor of the legislation establishing the Relocation Commission. The Commission report issued in 1983 amounted to our Government's official apology—41 years overdue—to the internees and their families.

It confirms what a great many conscientious Americans have long believed: these Americans of Japanese descent were clearly mistreated, and their basic civil liberties violated.

The ACLU singled out the internment and related abuses at the time "the worst single wholesale violation of civil rights of American citizens in our history."

As one commentator on the period said, "Japanese-Americans were the immediate victims of the evacuation. But larger consequences are carried by the American people as a whole. Their legacy is the lasting one of precedent and constitutional sanctity for a policy of mass incarceration under military auspices. This is a result of the process by which the evacuation was made. That process betrayed all Americans."

Since those tragic events took place, a number of the participants have had changed hearts and minds. Henry L. Stimson, who was Secretary of War, realized that "to loyal citizens this forced evacuation was a personal injustice." Former Attorney General Francis Biddle reiterated his belief that "the program was ill-advised, unnecessary and unnecessarily cruel." Justice William O. Douglas, one of the Supreme Court majority in the Korematsu decision holding the evacuation constitutionally permissible, later said the case "was ever on my conscience." And Chief Justice Earl Warren, who as California's attorney general had urged evacuation, afterward said, "I have since deeply regretted the removal order and my own testimony advocating it, because it was not in keeping with our American concept of freedom and the rights of citizens."

On February 17, 1942, Attorney General Francis Biddle wrote to Secretary Stimson opposing the proposed exclusion order, stating that the War Department and the FBI had found no danger of imminent attack or evidence of planned sabotage. Biddle especially objected to removal from their homes of 60,000 American citizens who happened to be of Japanese descent. He refused to let the Justice Department participate in any way with the exclusion policy.

Not a single documented act of espionage, sabotage, or fifth column activity was committed by the Nisei or by resident Japanese aliens on the west coast. Yet their lives were disrupted, fortunes were lost, and loyal citizens and legal residents incarcerated.

The victims of this policy were held collectively guilty, and collectively punished.

Moreover, the Government's attitude toward these innocent people fostered suspicions that often led to violence against them. Many were attacked when they attempted to return to their homes 3 years later.

The legislation I'm cosponsoring today redresses this mass violation of civil liberties and compensates internees for their suffering.

While the loss of liberty and the personal stigma attached to internment can never be erased, Federal reparations are a justifiable response to the legitimate financial losses incurred. An independent study done for the Commission found the economic losses alone to evacuees between $2.5 and $6.2 billion in today's dollar values, including interest for the past 40 years. Many consider this a conservative estimate of the real economic losses of homes and other property, stores and businesses. And these estimates do not begin to measure the personal hardships suffered.

The Commission found the cause of the exclusion and internment policies to be "race prejudice, war hysteria and a failure of political leadership."

On February 19, 1942, President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed Executive Order 9066. Shortly afterward, all American citizens of Japanese descent were barred from living, working, or traveling on the west coast. The same exclusion applied to a whole generation of Japanese immigrants residing at that time in the United States who, because of Federal law, were not permitted to become U.S. citizens.

After the initial plan for "voluntary" exclusion failed, these American citizens or legal residents were forcibly removed by the Army, first to assembly centers"—makeshift quarters in fairgrounds and racetracks—and then to "relocation centers." These latter camps, located in desolate western areas, were surrounded by barbed wire and guarded by military police.

The U.S. Government carried out its policy without reviewing individual cases or providing due process of law, and continued its policy virtually without regard for individuals who demonstrated loyalty to the United States.

Congress made it a crime to violate Executive Order 9066. The U.S. Supreme Court—in one of its most agonizing decisions—held the removal constitutionally permissible because of the war. Interestingly, since that decision a number of Justices from the majority—enough to have reversed the 5-4 decision—have written that on hindsight, they would have voted differently. The Supreme Court in a related case struck down imprisonment of these admittedly loyal American citizens. But long after the fact.

The Commission found that the main impetus leading to the exclusion order was the mistaken notion that individuals of Japanese descent would be loyal to Japan, not to the United States, and groundless fears of fifth column activity even though no evidence of such activities could be uncovered. The Commission stated that "the record does not permit the conclusion that military necessity warranted the exclusion of the ethnic Japanese from the west coast."

After exclusion became official policy, the War Relocation Authority [WRA]—the civilian agency charged with supervising the relocation—assumed that the vast majority of evacuees were loyal and should be allowed to resettle outside of the west coast. But because of harsh objections from certain mountain State politicians, a consensus plan for detention of the evacuees emerged. The WRA gave up on its idea of resettlement, and accepted a program of confinement. Despite WRA's belief that evacuees should be returned to normal productive life, it had, in effect, become their jailer. Since there was no military justification for detention, the WRA instead contended that the program was for the evacuees' own safety.

The history of life during the evacuation and in the relocation camps is one of suffering and deprivation. On the average, families received only 1 or 2 weeks notice of evacuation to an unknown destination. They could take with them only what could be carried. All else was lost or sold for cut-rate prices. Life in the relocation camps was spartan, with shoddy and crowded buildings, defective facilities, faulty heating, inadequate health care, and limited education programs. Privacy was impossible. Families and individuals alike lost their identities and became known only by identification numbers.

Because the Western Defense Command opposed individual loyalty reviews—for fear of weakening the blanket exclusion—no opportunity for individual review was created in the assembly centers. The War Department favored conducting loyalty reviews, but did not act on this until the end of 1942. Although these reviews eventually permitted some to leave relocation centers, it didn't end the exclusion from the west coast. Moreover, even this belated process was offensive, since it treated Japanese Americans as guilty until proven innocent.

In the spring of 1943, Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, Assistant Secretary of War John McCloy, and Gen. George C. Marshall reached the conclusion that the loyalty reviews eliminated any justification for exclusion from the west coast. They kept their views private, however, and General DeWitt repeatedly opposed ending exclusion until he left the Western Defense Command in late 1943, as did west coast anti-Japanese factions. Secretary Stimson finally put the recommendation before the Cabinet in May 1944. But no action was taken until December 7, 1944, while confinement continued for the great majority of Japanese Americans.

The exclusion and removal of Japanese-Americans resulted from a long history of anti-Japanese-American agitation and legislation on the west coast. By contrast, in Hawaii, where the military commander restrained plans for radical measures and treated the ethnic Japanese as loyal residents—absent evidence to the contrary—only 2,000 ethnic Japanese were taken into custody. The policy developed was in sharp contrast to Government actions against enemy aliens or citizens of non-Japanese descent. For example, the United States never ordered a mass exclusion or detention against American citizens of German or Italian descent.

This episode in American history should never have happened. It's the Government's responsibility to set the record straight and to try, at least, to recognize and partially compensate for past injustices, although the tarnish on our Constitution can never be completely removed.

Our purpose is to recognize and redress the injustices and violations of civil liberties against U.S. citizens and U.S. residents of Japanese and Aleut ancestry by the United States and to discourage similar injustices and violations of civil liberties in the future.

Those eligible are people of Japanese or Alaskan Aleut ancestry excluded from the west coast between December 7, 1941, and June 30, 1946, or deprived of liberty or property as a result of a series of Executive orders, proclamations, laws, Armed Forces directives, or other Federal actions resulting in exclusion, relocation, and/or detention of individuals on the basis of race.

This act is a just and fair redress to those individuals who were excluded and/or interned without justification, in gross violation of their civil liberties as American citizens and residents. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I join my colleagues today in support of legislation to redress the grave wrong done to those Americans of Japanese ancestry who were interned by the U.S. Government during World War II. As a country with a deep-seated commitment to basic human rights, we must vigorously confront this injustice of our past.

It has been almost 2 years since the recommendations of the Commission on Wartime Relocation were published expressing in graphic detail, the inhumanity imposed on this group of Americans in our country only 40 years ago. As the Commission's report documents, unsubstantiated fears about a few were used to rationalize the widescale incarceration of loyal Americans and legally admitted aliens. I can find no justification for the wrongs perpetrated against approximately 120,000 persons of Japanese birth or descent between 1942 and 1945.

The United States did not intern citizens of German and Italian ancestry, though the same logic applied to Japanese-Americans could have been applied to those of European heritage as well. Notably, however, people of German and Italian descent do not have physical characteristics and cultural traditions which could be used to distinguish them easily from the bulk of American society. In my view, this clearly demonstrates that the relocation and internment of Japanese-Americans during World War II was a prejudicial violation of their civil rights.

Residents of Washington State were particularly affected by the Executive Order 9066. Many residents living in and around Seattle were forced quickly to move to an assembly center near Puyallup, WA, and then further inland to relocation centers and internment camps. The subhuman conditions which existed at these centers and camps cannot be fully appreciated by those of us who were not rounded, shipped off to a relocation center or internment camp, and labeled "dangerous to society."

Life for the internees after their return to society was not easy. Discrimination and harassment continued after the war. The lives of the internees had forever been disrupted and scarred. Nothing can fully compensate the victims for the actions of the U.S. Government. Past attempts at compensation for the harm sustained, such as trauma, deprivation of personal freedoms, and economic loss experienced during relocation and internment, have been incomplete.

Picking an appropriate way of providing such compensation is a difficult task indeed. The legislation introduced today will implement the recommendations of the Commission on Wartime Relocation. I support many of the recommendations made by the Commission. The proposal to make monetary reparations to the internees, however, poses a number of serious questions. I am concerned about the source of the substantial sums necessary to make the recommended payments. I am also concerned about the implications of, and precedents which would be set by, making lump-sum payments to World War II internees, but not to others who have suffered equally serious civil rights violations.

Nonetheless, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this legislation in order to facilitate thoughtful discussion of this deeply emotional issue. I look forward to working with my colleagues today to redress the wrong that occurred 40 years ago.

Mr. MURKOWSKI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I should like to speak in behalf of the statement which has been presented by the junior Senator from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA].

I am pleased to join Senator MATSUNAGA, Senator INOUYE, and my senior colleague, Senator STEVENS, in authorizing this bipartisan bill to implement the recommendations of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians. Senator MATSUNAGA has already outlined in eloquent detail the merits of those Japanese Americans who were interned in concentration camps throughout our country, so I will confine my remarks to the injustices done to the Aleut Americans residing in my State of Alaska.

As my colleagues will recall, the independent Commission was established by act of Congress in 1980 to investigate the circumstances surrounding the relocation and internment of Japanese Americans and Aleut citizens during World War II. The Commission's reports were presented to Congress in January and June 1983. Those reports document fully the injustices suffered by those who were relocated to camps far from their homes in early 1942 for the duration of the war.

Mr. President, I recall, as a small child, observing on the outskirts of Ketchikan, AK, the Aleut camp where the Aleuts were confined. It was a very isolated area at the end of the road alongside a creek that flowed into a lake, a heavily timbered area. While there was available care from the U.S. Department of Public Health with regard to their medical needs, it was an area that was prone to some of the exposure of the outdoors in Alaska, which at times can be quite severe.

I recall my mother mentioning that many of those interned had an extraordinary high rate of tuberculosis.

There were areas throughout southeastern Alaska where camps were established, mostly in areas where there had been an abandoned cannery.

In the case of the Aleuts, who inhabited a number of small, remote villages on the Aleutian Island chain and the Pribilofs, the Commission determined that the military decision to relocate the people were justified under the circumstances. The Japanese enemy forces captured Attu and Kiska in early June 1942, and about 881 Aleut villagers were removed from their home villages by Army and Navy forces within the following 60 days.

Unfortunately, the relocation of the Aleuts to abandoned fish canneries and mining camps in southeastern Alaska resulted in disease and death among some of the residents of the camps.

The Commission found on examination that indeed medical care was inadequate and, as Senator MATSUNAGA indicated, there were a number of those Aleut people who died in their internment, shelter and food were below standard, and sanitary facilities were poor. At least 10 percent of all Aleuts relocated to camps perished before their villages were restored on the Aleutian and Pribilof Islands.

Upon their return, after an extended period of time of 2 to 3 to 4 years in camp, the Aleuts were returned to their villages in the western part of Alaska, the Alaska Peninsula, the Aleutian Islands.

The Aleuts found their personal and community property had been converted without compensation for military use, destroyed, or taken by those who occupied villages in the Aleuts' absence. They were never fully compensated for these losses. In addition, some of their churches were burned or were desecrated, or stripped of invaluable religious icons dating from 18th and 19th century Imperial Russia. There was never any effort by our Government to replace or rehabilitate the churches and church properties destroyed or severely damaged while under U.S. control during the war.

Mr. President, the populated areas of the Lower Alaska Peninsula and the Aleutians are still littered with the debris and abandoned structures from the U.S. military occupation of the islands. In recent years at least one child, who lived with his family in Cold Bay, lost the use of his hand when a World War II fuse exploded. He had been playing in an area where live ammunition still litters the lands outside the village. The Commission has recommended that this debris be cleaned up, as the debris from World War II has been cleaned up in Japan, Europe, and elsewhere, often with substantial American assistance.

Mr. President, our legislation implements the five recommendations of the Commission to provide restitution to the Aleut people for the losses they suffered as a consequence of Government operations during the war years. In addition the bill implements the Commission's recommendations for restitution of Japanese-American losses. I know that Senators MATSUNAGA and INOUYE will be addressing the Japanese-American issues in connection with the introduction of this legislation. Thus I have limited my remarks to the Aleut issues at this time.

Mr. President, 40 years and more have passed since the Aleuts were relocated to unimaginably inadequate camp facilities in southeastern Alaska. A number of those who suffered the most are quite elderly—an even greater number have already passed away. I urge the Senate to consider this legislation promptly, as substantial justice to the Aleut people as compensation for losses sustained as a result of U.S. Government activities in World War II. The restitution provided in our bill should not be unreasonably delayed any longer.

Again, I thank Senator MATSUNAGA for his very eloquent statement, and I am very pleased to be with him.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I yield.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I wish to thank him for the leadership he has shown in this matter and for joining me and 24 others in cosponsoring this measure.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I very much appreciate the comments of my colleague from Hawaii.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SECTION 1. (a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the findings of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians, established by the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians Act, accurately and completely describe the circumstances of the exclusion, relocation and internment of in excess of 110,000 United States citizens and permanent resident aliens of Japanese ancestry and the treatment of the individuals of Aleut ancestry who were removed from the Aleutian and Pribilof Islands;

(2) the internment of individuals of Japanese ancestry was carried out without any documented acts of espionage or sabotage, or other acts of disloyalty by any citizens or permanent resident aliens of Japanese ancestry on the west coast;

(3) there was no military security reason for the internment;

(4) the internment of the individuals of Japanese ancestry was caused by racial prejudice, war hysteria, and a failure of political leadership;

(5) the excluded individuals of Japanese ancestry suffered enormous damages and losses, both material and intangible, and there were incalculable losses in education and job training, all of which resulted in significant human suffering;

(6) the basic civil liberties and constitutional rights of those individuals of Japanese ancestry interned were fundamentally violated by that evacuation and internment;

(7) as documented in the Commission's reports, the Aleut civilian residents of the Pribilof Islands and the Aleutian Islands west of Unimak Island were relocated during World War II to temporary camps in isolated regions of Southeast Alaska where they remained, under United States control and in the care of the United States, until long after any potential danger to their home villages had passed;

(8) the United States failed to provide reasonable care for the Aleuts, and this resulted in widespread illness, disease, and death among the residents of the camps; and the United States further failed to protect Aleut personal and community property while such property was in its possession or under its control;

(9) the United States has not compensated the Aleuts adequately for the conversion or destruction of personal property caused by the United States military occupation of Aleut villages during World War II;

(10) the United States has not removed certain abandoned military equipment and structures from inhabited Aleutian Islands following World War II, thus creating conditions which constitute potential hazards to the health and welfare of the residents of the islands;

(11) the United States has not rehabilitated Attu village, thus precluding the development of Attu Island for the benefit of the Aleut people and impairing the preservation of traditional Aleut property on the island; and

(12) there is no remedy for injustices suffered by the Aleuts during World War II except an Act of Congress providing appropriate compensation for those losses which are attributable to the conduct of United States forces and other officials and employees of the United States.

(b) PURPOSES.—The purposes of this Act are to—

(1) acknowledge the fundamental injustice of the evacuation, relocation, and internment of United States citizens and permanent resident aliens of Japanese ancestry;

(2) apologize on behalf of the people of the United States for the evacuation, relocation, and internment of the citizens and permanent resident aliens of Japanese ancestry;

(3) provide for a public education fund to finance efforts to inform the public about the internment of such individuals so as to prevent the reoccurrence of any similar event;

(4) make restitution to those individuals of Japanese ancestry who were interned;

(5) make restitution to Aleut residents of the Pribilof Islands and the Aleutian Islands west of Unimak Island, in settlement of United States obligations in equity and at law, for—

(A) injustices suffered and unreasonable hardships endured while under United States control during World War II;

(B) personal property taken or destroyed by United States forces during World War II;

(C) community property, including community church property, taken or destroyed by United States forces during World War II; and

(D) traditional village lands on Attu Island not rehabilitated after World War II for Aleut occupation or other productive use.

(2) a requirement that the accounts of the Association, as they relate to its capacity as Administrator, shall be audited annually in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards by independent certified public accountants or independent licensed public accountants; and a further requirement that each such audit report shall be transmitted to the Secretary and to the Committees on the Judiciary of the Senate and House of Representatives; and

Such trust shall be established pursuant to the laws of the State of Alaska, and shall be maintained and operated by not more than seven trustees, as designated by the Administrator. Each affected Aleut village, including the survivors of the Aleut village of Attu, may submit to the Administrator a list of three prospective trustees. In designating trustees pursuant to this subsection, the Administrator shall designate one trustee from each such list submitted.

(2) The trustees shall maintain and operate the trust as eight independent and separate accounts, including—

(A) one account for the independent benefit of the wartime Aleut residents of Attu and their descendants;

(C) one account for the independent benefit of those Aleuts who, as determined by the trustees, are deserving but will not benefit directly from the accounts established pursuant to subparagraphs (A) and (B).

The trustees shall credit to the account described in subparagraph (C), an amount equal to five per centum of the principal amount credited by the Administrator to the trust. The remaining principal amount shall be divided among the accounts described in subparagraphs (A) and (B), in proportion to the June 1, 1942, Aleut civilian population of the village for which each such account is established, as compared to the total civilian Aleut population on such date of all affected Aleut villages.

(3) The trust established by this subsection shall be administered in a manner that is consistent with the laws of the State of Alaska, and as prescribed by the Administrator, after consultation with representative eligible Aleuts, the residents of affected Aleut villages, and the Secretary. In any case of irreconcilable differences between the Administrator and the review panel with respect to any specific portion of the plans and recommendations for work to be performed under this subsection, the Secretary shall submit such specific portion of such plans and recommendations to the Congress for approval or disapproval by joint resolution.

(3) In contracting for any necessary construction work to be performed on churches or church property under this subsection, the Administrator shall give preference to the Aleutian Housing Authority as general contractor. Such program is being accomplished pursuant to Acts making Appropriations for the Department of Defense, in accordance with Congressional statements of purpose in establishing and funding the Environmental Restoration Defense Account. The Congress finds that such a program is essential for the further development of safe, sanitary housing conditions, public facilities, and public utilities within the region.

(c) ADMINISTRATION OF PROGRAM.—The debris removal program authorized under subsection (a) shall be carried out substantially in accordance with the recommendations for a "minimum cleanup" contained in the report prepared by the Alaska District, Corps of Engineers, entitled "Debris Removal and Cleanup Study: Aleutian Island and Lower Alaska Peninsula, Alaska," dated October 1976. In carrying out the program required by this section, the Chief of Engineers shall consult with the trustees of the trust established by section 7(b) of this Act, and shall give preference to the Aleutian Housing Authority as general contractor.

In order to make restitution for the loss of traditional Aleut lands and village properties on Attu Island, while preserving the present designation of Attu Island lands as part of the National Wilderness Preservation System, compensation to the Aleut people in lieu of Attu Island conveyance shall be provided in accordance with this section.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall establish an account designated The Aleut Corporation Property Account, which shall be available for the purpose of bidding on Federal surplus property. The initial balance of the account shall be $17,868,500, which reflects an entitlement of $500 for each of the 35,737 acres within that part of eastern Attu Island traditionally occupied and used by the Aleut people for subsistence hunting and fishing. The balance of the account shall be adjusted as necessary to reflect successful bids under subsection (c) or other conveyances of property under subsections (f) and (g).

(c) The Corporation may, by using the account established in subsection (b) bid, as any other bidder for surplus property, wherever located, in accordance with the requirements of section 484 of title 40, United States Code. No preference right of any type will be offered to the Corporation for bidding for General Services Administration surplus property under this subsection and no additional advertising shall be required other than that prescribed in section 484(e)(2) of title 40, United States Code.

(d) The amount charged against the Treasury account established under subsection (b) shall be treated as proceeds of dispositions of surplus property for the purpose of determining the basis for calculating direct expenses pursuant to section 485(b) of title 40, United States Code.

(e) The basis of computing gain or loss on subsequent sale or other disposition of property conveyed to the Corporation under this section for purposes of any Federal, State or local tax imposed on or measured by income, shall be the fair value of such property at the time of receipt. The amount charged against the Treasury account established under subsection (b) shall be prima facie evidence of such fair value.

(f) The Administrator of General Services may, at the discretion of the Administrator, tender to the Secretary of the Treasury any surplus property otherwise to be disposed of pursuant to section 484(e)(3) of title 40, United States Code, to be offered to the Corporation for a period of 90 days so as to aid in the fulfillment of the Secretary of the Treasury's obligations for restitution to the Aleut people under this section: Provided, That prior to any disposition under this subsection or subsection (g), the Administrator shall notify the governing body of the locality where such property is located and any appropriate state agency, and no such disposition shall be made if such governing body or State agency within ninety days of such notification formally advises the Administrator that it objects to the proposed disposition.

(g)(1) Notwithstanding any provision of any other law or any implementing regulation inconsistent with this subsection, concurrently with the commencement of screening of any excess real property, wherever located, for utilization by Federal agencies, the Administrator of General Services shall notify the Corporation that such property may be available for conveyance to the Corporation upon negotiated sale. Within fifteen days of the date of receipt of such notice, the Corporation may advise the Administrator that there is a tentative need for the property to fulfill the obligations established under this section. If the Administrator determines the property should be disposed of by transfer to the Corporation, the Administrator or other appropriate Federal official shall promptly transfer such property.

(2) No disposition or conveyance of property under this subsection to the Corporation shall be made until the Administrator of General Services, after notice to affected State and local governments, has provided to them such opportunity to obtain the property as is recognized in title 40, United States Code and the regulations thereunder for the disposition or conveyance of surplus property.

(3) As used in this subsection, "real property" means any land or interests in land owned or held by the United States or any Federal agency, any improvements on such land or rights to their use or exploitation, and any personal property related to the land.

SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

SEC. 310. If any provision of this title, or the application of such provision to any person or circumstances, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this title or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

DR. WILLIAM WOOD—ALASKAN OF THE YEAR

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, a close friend and gentleman who I admire very much, Dr. William Wood, was recently honored in my State as Alaskan of the Year. I rise today to recognize Dr. Wood and join with my senior colleague, Senator STEVENS, in paying tribute on this long overdue honor by this fellow Alaskan. I, as Senator STEVENS, join with his wife, Dorothy Jane, in congratulating him and share with my colleagues some of the remarkable achievements of his career.

Bill Wood, who describes himself as an "old farm boy from Illinois," adopted Alaska as his home in 1960 and has been an extraordinary asset to the State of Alaska ever since.

Bill served for 13 years as president of the University of Alaska.

Under his guidance, the university experienced tremendous growth and became a magnificent and respected, not only statewide system of higher education, which he established, but very dominant in areas of Arctic science.

His emphasis on research, particularly in matters pertaining to the North, contributed heavily to the university's growing reputation.

Following his retirement in 1973, Dr. Wood continued to benefit his community of Fairbanks and the State of Alaska through a number of tasks and positions undertaken with selfless determination.

As the mayor of Fairbanks, and later as head of a special city task force, Bill prepared the city for the tremendous changes that were to come with the construction of the trans-Alaska oil pipeline.

When the State of Alaska celebrated its 25th anniversary in 1984, Dr. Wood, as director of Festival Fairbanks 1984, made his community's local celebration into an event that attracted nearly all of the State's past and present dignitaries. Because of his energetic efforts, Fairbanks became the focus of Alaska's silver anniversary celebration.

Mr. President, Dr. Wood's contributions to the State of Alaska go well beyond his record of achievement. He is a creative thinker whose ideas have already begun to shape Alaska's future in ways that are difficult to express. Dr. Wood can grasp the issues of the day, but he is particularly gifted in anticipating and preparing for the issues of tomorrow. His thinking is not confined to the short term.

Twenty years ago, I can remember Bill Wood talking about Pacific-rim trade and the importance of seeking new markets for U.S. goods in Japan, Korea, Taiwan, and the Republic of China. He long ago recognized the inexorable relationship between Alaska and Asia and the role that Alaska could play in the growth of the Pacific. Of course, today, we all recognize that relationship. A great deal of the recent public debate in Alaska and Washington has focused on our trade relationship with the Pacific rim nations. Clearly, Bill Wood recognized the Pacific trade issue before it became acute. Like many Alaskans, I have learned to listen very carefully to what he has to say.

Several years ago, Bill Wood started talking about the development of the Arctic, and the ways we might go about that development in a manner that would preserve and enhance that pristine region of our planet. I am proud to note that the Congress of the United States has begun to respond to some of his ideas with the passage of the Dr. William Wood Review Board Arctic Research and Policy Act, Public Law 98-373. Many of Bill Wood's ideas lay at the very foundation of that legislation. His guidance, encouragement and inspiration were instrumental in the act's passage, and I continue to turn to him for help as the act is implemented.

I am proud that I have the opportunity today to honor Bill Wood for his years of dedicated service to the State of Alaska. There are few living Alaskans who are as respected as he. Dr. William Wood has been rightfully honored as Alaskan of the Year.

Thank you, Mr. President.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR EVANS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Washington is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. EVANS. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE BUDGET

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I have chosen this method to speak to my colleagues rather than take up the time of argument on the budget.

Much has been said during the course of argument on both the overall package which is now in front of the Senate and debate on the individual amendments of the pain—the pain we are expecting the American people to go through as a result of budget deficit reduction.

There has been little talk or recognition of the rewards which can come with a successful and bold action on deficit reduction.

Daily we are seeing the growing importance of bold action. Washington State has not fully recovered from the economic distress of a few years ago. Unemployment now stands at 9.3 percent, 2 percent above the national average. Some counties in Washington State have unemployment exceeding 20 percent.

Now the economy is again slowing. The latest forecast for the second quarter of fiscal 1985 is a growth of 1.3 percent, down from the 4.3 percent of the first quarter. We will need an average growth of more than 5 percent for the next two quarters to reach the predicted 3.9 percent per year of the administration.

Further, the Dow-Jones averages are down sharply over the last week.

All of this points to the need for dramatic action by the Members of this Senate.

We have two choices. We can cut the deficits substantially and reap the benefits and rewards which come from doing that, or maintain program spending and watch the deficit continue to grow with the resulting pain which accrues to all of our citizens.

The rewards of success—major economists of this Nation see at least a 1-percent interest drop in the short term and 2 to 3 percent in the long term.

Most economists agree that enactment of a budget package such as the one we are now considering would result in a long-term real growth in the gross national product of at least 4 percent and unemployment dropping from 7.3 to 6.5 percent or lower.

That translates into the creation of 7 million new jobs by 1988, housing starts back to something like a 2 million level, and inflation that is kept under control.

This success comes to all Americans, not just major corporations, not just some who are wealthy. Every Social Security recipient, every retiree, every Federal worker, everyone asked to take part in the pain of deficit reduction will share in the rewards of success. The rewards of lower costs of living, the rewards of lower interest rates and the greater ease in buying housing, and the rewards of new jobs for our children and for our American compatriots can be expected.

Let me turn to a real danger we face and do not readily recognize. We are all operating on the basis that the baseline deficit will be $227 billion next year, if we do nothing. And if we do nothing it will be even larger in 1987 and in 1988. And net interest payments on our growing national debt will consume an ever-increasing share of our Federal income.

But we are being optimistic in making those predictions. The administration, in every single case, has been more optimistic than all the forecasts of our major economists and major analysts. In predictions of the rate of growth of gross national product, they are outside the range of even the most optimistic alternative analyst. In terms of cost of living and interest rates, they are more optimistic in keeping them low than any of the others. And the number of jobs or the unemployment of our citizens suggests much more that can realistically be expected.

But it is a fragile starting point. Every 1 percent of gross national product that we miss will result in a change in the deficit of $19 billion per year and $123 billion over the 3-year period we are debating. That means that one-third of the total savings we are predicting could be chewed up if our gross national product rises 1 percent less than we are assuming. The same thing in terms of interest rates, $9 billion a year for every 1 percent we miss in our projections. The inflation rate—$500 million for every 1 percent in inflation rate that we are in error.

So, the fact that we are optimistic means that we have to act boldly. We have to go at least as far as the level we are now debating if we are going to get the expected rewards.

The need for action is simply overwhelming. And I would say to my colleagues that it is not a question of: freeze versus nonfreeze, program cuts versus a freeze, or revenue adjustments versus either of those other two. We ought to move swiftly to achieve the maximum-size program possible. This should include both a freeze in our major spending programs plus significant program cuts in a wide variety of areas. And after we have done that job, we may need, in addition, some revenue adjustments in order to create a program of sufficient size. A program that we can then enjoy the end results—the end results in terms of gross national product growth, job growth, cost-of-living stability, plus a program to ensure that the optimistic predictions we have made over the next few years will actually come to pass.

Finally, there is much talk about driving people below the poverty line. One thing we seldom talk about is the fact that if we fail to act, if the cost of living escalates rapidly, if interest rates go up, so too will the poverty line. And more and more people will fall below the poverty line because we fail to act.

I suggest, Mr. President, that we will have more people categorized as poverty stricken if we fail to act than if we act in the most courageous possible fashion. We may be creating some pain to Americans, but also creating the rewards that lie just ahead of bold action.

RECOGNITION FOR NURSING HOME EMPLOYEES

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, the week of May 12-18, has been designated as "National Nursing Home Week." The theme of this year's observance, "Celebrate Lifetime Achievements," will honor the significant accomplishments of the more than 1.5 million residents of our Nation's nursing homes.

As nursing home residents and their families gather for special activites and social functions during National Nursing Home Week, it is particularly appropriate to pay special recognition to the tireless and dedicated efforts of the more than 800,000 nursing home employees. As one who has had a family member in a nursing home in South Dakota. I have personally witnessed the devotion to duty and many kindnesses displayed by the hard workers in our long-term care facilities. Without their support, there would be no nursing facilities to serve our needy elderly.

Please join me in expressing our debt of gratitude during this celebration of National Nursing Home Week for the invaluable contributions of the thousands of nursing home employees.

WOMEN IN THE MILITARY: MANY JOBS OFF LIMITS

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to draw attention to an issue that directly touches more than half of our population, but has lost a substantial degree of the careful consideration and necesary commitment it once received and still deserves. The issue to which I am referring is our continued obligation to increase opportunities available to women in the U.S. military.

Serious consideration of women and their relationship to the military began nearly 40 years ago. Since then, there has been an evolutionary, as opposed to revolutionary, process of integration.

It was in 1948 that the Women's Armed Services Integration Act was passed. This granted women the opportunity to become part of the permanent Military Establishment. The act gave Regular and Reserve status to women in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force and was a true milestone for women in the military.

This law, however, was not perfect. It imposed restrictions that included a 2-percent ceiling on the number of women in the Regular Establishment of each service, as well as limited promotion opportunities for female officers.

Another important step was taken in 1951 with the establishment of what has proven to be a highly influential and effective body: The Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services [DACOWITS]. Its task has been to advise the Secretary of Defense on all matters concerning women in the services, as well as to keep the public informed of military women and their role in our Armed Forces.

DACOWITS members are both male and female civilians who are selected on the basis of their outstanding reputations in business, the professions, public service, and their records of civic leadership. They serve as individuals, not as official representatives of any group or organization. Members make recommendations to the Department of Defense on matters such as the retentions rate, housing, pay and allowances, job opportunities and existing inequalities. They have initiated countless studies and have been the driving force behind the passage of many essential bills. Great strides have been made for military women due to the commitment of DACOWITS members.

It was in 1967 that a number of the barriers obstructing women's advancement were broken down. A very important event was the DACOWITS inspired passage of Public Law 90-130, which repealed the 2-percent ceiling imposed in 1948, allowed the appointment of women to flag and general rank, and permitted women other than medical personnel to join the National Guard.

The Defense Officer Personnel Act [Dopma] was also established, and it required gender-free promotion opportunities. Overall, military women were heading toward a decade of rapid expansion in opportunities and significant changes in their responsibilities.

The end of the draft and the birth of the All-Volunteer Force propelled women into their most successful military decade, the 1970's. Between 1973 and 1978 the positions of director of the Women Accepted for Voluntary Emergency Service [WAVES], Women in the Air Force [WAF], Women in the Marine Corps, and the Women's Army Corps [WAC] were abolished.

By 1972, the Reserve Office Training Corps [ROTC] was opened to women, and a large number of women enrolled. This was followed by the admission of women into the service academies. We saw our first women graduates in the class of 1980.

Later, in 1978, Congress officially passed legislation abolishing the Women's Army Corps as a separate unit. In addition, basic training was integrated. And, finally, Congress modified section 6015 of title 10 of the United States Code, permitting women to serve permanent duty on vessels not expected to be assigned combat mission, and up to 6 months temporary duty on other Navy ships.

Not surprisingly, from 1970 to 1980, the number of women on active duty grew from 41,000 or 1.9 percent of the active force, to 170,000 and 8.1 percent of total active strength. The number of women in the Reserve components increased substantially as well.

It was in 1980, as I am sure we all remember, that former President Carter proposed resuming registration for the draft. The plan included both men and women. Unfortunately, Congress chose to exclude women from registration. That, however, should not allow us to decrease our commitment to military women. More remains to be done to fulfill the obligation we should all feel to women in the armed services.

Today, entry to every service branch, opportunities to be promoted, and access to education and training are all, in some manner, denied to women exclusively on the basis of gender. Despite the progress which has been made, artifical barriers continue to confront women seeking military careers.

With the exception of the Air Force and the Coast Guard, the recruitment policies for women in the Army, Navy, and the Marine Corps are much stricter than those for men. All branches of the armed services use the Armed Forces qualification test [AFQT] to determine the enlistment eligibility of personnel.

The AFQT consists of questions in four subject areas measuring basic verbal and quantitative abilities. The scores of the AFQT are used to classify potential enlistees in mental categories ranging from I to V. Congress has limited recruitment of persons who score in category IV to 20 percent of enlistees, while the services have chosen not to enlist any individuals scoring in category V.

The Army does not recruit any mental category IV females. It requires all women seeking enlistment to hold a high school diploma, and it does not accept general educational development [GED] certificates as a replacement. Male category IV high school graduates, however, are eligible for Army service.

Navy recruitment policies have similar disparities between men and women. Once again, all women wishing to enlist must be high school graduates, but those in category IV are eligible. The same would apply if the high school graduate were male. But the Navy will also accept nongraduate, non-prior-service males with a GED who score at least a 49—category IIIB—or better on the AFQT.

The Marine Corps also requires female enlistees to hold a high school diploma or "equivalent education"—a GED is not acceptable. If, however, the applicant is male, he need only to have attended school through the 10th grade. Female high school graduates need a minimum AFQT of 50—category IIIB—while their male counterparts need a score of only 21—category IV—to be accepted into the Marine Corps.

Each of these services has produced unique recruitment policies restricting the enlistment of women, consequently, women face discriminatory policies before they even "get their feet in the door." We must then ask: If the Air Force and the Coast Guard find no difficulties with requiring identical qualifications for both male and female applicants, why cannot the Army, Navy, and the Marines do the same?

Similar disparities exist in the career opportunities for women in each service. An excellent example is found by comparing the Navy and the Coast Guard. Women in the latter serve on all ships in the Coast Guard fleet and in all positions, including the command of ships. The Coast Guard has placed no restrictions based solely on gender in assignment, training, recruitment, or career opportunities.

Women in the Navy, however, are restricted in their permanent assignments to approximately 74 ships—in a fleet approaching 600 in strength. Twenty-eight of these seventy-four ships have surface warfare positions that provide an opportunity for warfare qualification and career development. Twenty-five of these twenty-eight ships are tenders and repair ships whose primary mission is accomplished in port. The remaining 46 ships are diving and salvage ships and civilian manned military sealift command ships—whose military positions are limited only to communication and supply areas.

In a period of war, the Coast Guard would come under the control of the Secretary of the Navy. Ironically, women in the Coast Guard would then be performing in positions restricted to them if they were subject to Navy law. The Coast Guard has stated that its ships would not be sufficiently staffed if women were suddenly denied the positions they presently held.

Similar ambiguities may be found regarding the assignment of women to aircraft, missile crews, and positions on the battlefield. Women can be pilots and navigators in the Army, Navy, and Air Force. They can fly combat support aircraft such as cargo planes, refueling planes, AWAC's, and certain helicopters, but they are not permitted permanent assignment to fighter jets.

Interestingly, though, when we turn to the Marine Corps, we find that all pilot and navigator positions are closed to women. Why are the women who enter pilot positions in the Army, Navy, and Air Force denied identical opportunities in the Marine Corps?

The Army is the only service that restricts the assignment of women by battlefield location. It uses a direct combat probability coding [DCPC] which divides the battlefield into seven positions ranging from high combat probability—P1—to no direct combat probability—P7.

The DCPC does not prevent the permanent assignment of women to combat support or combat service support positions, but it does bar them from assignment to positions expected to engage in direct combat. What is of great concern to Army women is that the DCPC appears to stifle career opportunities for them. The sophistication of modern weapons nullifies any attempts to segregate a battlefield. Women would be routinely brought into a P1 location in war time.

In 1982 we saw 23 additional military occupational specialties [MOS] closed to women due to their combat probability or requirements for physical strength. Only after significant external pressure and internal turmoil did the Army reopen 13 of the 23 MOS's it had proposed closing to women. The Assistant Secretary of Defense announced plans at that time to modify the physical strength test, thus opening more jobs to women.

In addition, it should be noted that the physical strength standards were modified by the Assistant Secretary of Defense to assure that 100 percent of the men would qualify for heavy and very heavy work. The original standard of 100 pounds would have eliminated 20 percent of male enlistees from assignment to heavy or very heavy jobs, in other words combat arms.

At present the Army prohibits women in 49 out of a total 357 occupational specialties and in any "infantry, armor, cannon field, artillery, combat engineer, and low altitude air defense artillery unit of battalion/squadron or smaller size regardless of the occupational specialty."

Women now comprise approximately 9.5 percent of the active duty force. The Department of Defense has projected only a small increase in this number by the end of 1987. During the Carter administration, plans estimated that the percentage of women in the service would reach 12 percent by 1988, but that figure has been scaled down to 10.3 percent.

What we also find is that the majority of women in the services are clustered in the middle to lower officer grades—and the disparity becomes much greater if the medical officers, which includes nurses, are excluded. Currently, there are three women at the flag/general officer level in the Army—and one promotable—three in the Air Force, and three in the Navy; there are none in the Marine Corps. Interestingly, there are very few women line officers in the O-6 grade, indicating a slow expansion in the distribution of women officers.

The Department of Defense has correctly stated that "with time the distribution of women officers should begin to approximate that of men." But because of the small number of women in the O-6 grade we cannot expect to see this for another 7 to 8 years.

What we need to see is women appointed to and given the opportunity to serve in decisionmaking roles. We need to eliminate the assumption that all military positions are appropriate for men, but that only some are appropriate for women.

The issue of women in the military and the opportunities available to them is much too important to be allowed to settle in the back of our minds. Therefore, I strongly urge that we continue to make a concerted effort to expand the opportunities available to women in the military.

At this point, I would like to place in the RECORD some items prepared by the Women's Equity Action League on this issue and an article from the March 14 Wall Street Journal, "Women Move Up in the Military, But Many Jobs Remain Off Limits." These will, I know, be of interest to all who are concerned about the role of women in the military.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WOMEN MOVE UP IN THE MILITARY, BUT MANY JOBS REMAIN OFF LIMITS

(By Francine Schwadel)

When she was 12 years old, Rosemary Mariner decided to become a pilot. Soon she was washing planes to pay for flying lessons. Later she studied aviation at Purdue University, and in 1973 she joined the Navy.

Today she teaches Navy pilots how to fly jets at a training base in Kingsville, Texas. But because she is a woman, Lt. Cmdr. Mariner, now 31, isn't allowed to fly many of the missions that she is training her male students for.

Cmdr. Mariner has flown attack jets on research missions to test new weapons. She has qualified as an aircraft-carrier pilot and as a surface-warfare officer. But, she says, "Everything I've done is really no big deal for a man."

A MACHO WORLD

Her experience illustrates the formidable barriers that military women still face in this most macho of male worlds. Despite an explosion in their ranks and responsibilities over the past 12 years, women in all branches of the armed services except the Coast Guard are still excluded by federal laws and policies from holding jobs in combat units.

The Navy's 6,606 women officers and 42,258 enlisted women face some of the most severe constraints. They are prohibited by law from holding any of the permanent posts on most of the Navy's 527 ships, effectively keeping them out of jobs that aspiring male officers typically master on their way to the top.

"If I couldn't theoretically reach the top of the profession, how could I be anything but junior varsity?" asks Cmdr. Mariner. Says Lt. Cmdr. Deborah Burnette, a public-affairs officer, "Until I can go everywhere my (male) lieutenant-commander peers can go, it isn't going to be equal."

Money isn't the issue; many women say they were attracted to the military partly because they receive equal pay for equal work.

PROMOTION VS. EQUALITY

The Navy says that good promotion opportunities exist for women, who make up about 9% of its officers and 8% of its enlisted personnel. But Cmdr. Mariner says: "You can't confuse promotion opportunity with equal opportunity. It's the kinds of commands and the kinds of jobs you get as a senior officer that are very important."

With most women officers still clustered in the junior grades, frustration could spread in the years ahead. The number of jobs women can hold is expected to grow as the Navy expands, but women aren't likely to command anything but support units soon. "We've opened it up as far as we can open it up" under the combat-exclusion law, says Rear Adm. Albert J. Herberger, the Navy's director of personnel policy, and Congress isn't likely to repeal the law in the next few years.

Critics of the law question the wisdom of continuing to restrict women's role in a technological era when brains increasingly count for more than brawn. They also cite studies indicating that it will become harder to recruit men. "We can no longer afford the luxury of discriminating against 50% of the population that has the kind of talent that is difficult to get," says retired Adm. Elmo R. Zumwalt Jr., former chief of naval operations.

When the draft ended in the early 1970s, services recruited women in earnest to meet projected manpower shortages and pressure from feminists. Women became pilots, sailors and military-academy students. They rose through the ranks to become commanding officers of noncombat outfits, and some mixed motherhood with military careers.

The 1980s have brought slower progress—and some backpedaling. In 1981, for example, the Navy tightened restrictions on the temporary assignment of women to ships in the Mediterranean, the Indian Ocean and the Far East.

These days more than two-thirds of the Navy's women officers are either nurses or administrators in such fields as training, recruiting and personnel records. The administrators compete for promotions with men who rotate to shore duty from tours at sea. These women generally bristle at any suggestion that they aren't leading full Navy careers—and many don't want to see the combat exclusion lifted—but the Navy makes it clear that a string of desk jobs wouldn't be considered a good career path for a man.

Now there are so many desk-bound officers on this primarily female track that the Navy has created a new career path to expand promotion opportunities. Under the old system, desk-bound women who wanted to advance had to serve as executive or commanding officers of mostly training, recruiting or personnel-record units. Now they will be allowed to rise in rank—and pay grade—also by holding a series of non-command jobs in several other areas such as financial management, intelligence, international affairs, weapons acquisition and computer science. These fields were open to women before, but there were fewer promotion opportunities.

Opportunities remain extremely limited, however, for the 175 female surface-warfare officers, who are preparing themselves for sea duty. Because of the combat-exclusion law, they can serve on only 33 of the Navy's 527 ships, and those 33 operate mainly on the fringes of the fleet; most don't spend much time at sea. They are repair vessels, research ships, tenders and the like. Lt. Deborah Barnhart's reaction is typical: "To spend 20 years to get to be a capitain of a tender isn't enough incentive."

Surface-warfare women who reach the rank of lieutenant commander after about 10 years have even fewer options. At this stage, men typically compete for jobs as second-in-command of ships, but only one ship is available for a woman with similar qualifications. It is the USS Norton Sound, a missile test ship, and its current executive officer is a man.

IT'S A BOTTLENECK

"It's great as long as you're a lieutenant or below," says Lt. Cmdr. Bonnie Walker, one of six women senior enough to be considered for the Norton Sound job. "Once you make lieutenant commander, the question is, 'Is the Navy going to open up an executive-officer billet for a woman?' And the next question is, 'When?' It's a bottleneck, right now."

Adm. Herberger says the Navy plans to assign a woman to the Norton Sound post in 1986, when it is next scheduled to open up.

But that isn't much consolation for Comdr. Walker, who believes she was qualified in 1984 when the job was last open. If she doesn't go to sea as an executive officer in the next two or three years, the 36-year-old officer figures she will fall behind the men who do, eliminating her from competition for future leadership jobs at sea. The Navy recognizes the problem but says that women like her can still advance by holding leadership jobs ashore. Cmdr. Walker doesn't think that's the same thing.

"For women, just being qualified isn't enough," says 36-year-old Cmdr. Walker, now the satellite-communications officer at Atlantic fleet headquarters in Norfolk, Va. "A lot of women are going to fall by the wayside because we don't have an adequate number of ships available to us to be selected for. What we're trained for is to use our skills at sea."

Because opportunities are limited, the Navy allows only 17 women to enter the surface-warfare community each year. And about 30 such women have transferred out in recent years to other Navy specialties.

One is Lt. Susan Alison Cowan, 25, who transferred partly because she would have faced "a tremendous amount of time without going to sea," she says. Ironically, she became second-in-command of a vessel after giving up on a surface-warfare career. She went to the Navy's diving school and, armed with new qualifications, took over last June as second-in-command of the USS Quapaw, a tug that does towing and salvage work off the West Coast.

The tiny 40-year-old ship, based at Port Hueneme, Calif., is decorated with battle ribbons from World War II, Korea and Vietnam. It is scheduled to be decommissioned in August, but to Lt. Cowan, the first Navy woman ever to serve as second-in-command of a ship, the tug looks "really super."

CHANGE COMES SLOWLY

Lt. Cowan, who pedals an exercise bicycle in her tiny stateroom to stay in shape, doesn't dwell on her status. "Change comes slowly," she says. Later she adds: "I think that the women before me, the way they did the job has opened up what I'm able to do now. And the way I do my job will open up things for women 10 years junior to me."

Joellen Oslund, one of the first women recruited for flight training, resigned in 1979 because the Navy couldn't offer her enough challenge as a helicopter pilot. She and five other women had sued to have the Navy's combat-exclusion law declared unconstitutional.

The court agreed, and Congress relaxed the law somewhat. But the Navy took until December 1983 to decide that women helicopter pilots could be deployed temporarily on certain support ships in the Mediterranean, the Indian Ocean and the Far East.

Other women officers who share Mrs. Oslund's frustration stay nevertheless and press for further change. Cmdr. Mariner believes women would be integrated more fully, as blacks were during World War II, if the U.S. were to go to war. "Being paid to go out and fly is super," she says. "But the account comes due when we get attacked. This is not IBM. The reason you've got that uniform on is to defend your country."

RECRUITMENT STATISTICS AND POLICIES: WOMEN IN THE ACTIVE ARMED SERVICES

OVERVIEW

203,310 women, officers and enlisted, served in the U.S. Armed Forces at the end of fiscal year (FY) 1984.[1] They comprised 9.5% of the active duty force.

In FY 84, the Services enlisted 36,114 female non-prior service recruits (Non-prior service recruits are individuals who have never served in the military). This represents an increase of 4.6% from FY 83.

The Armed Forces recruited 93% High School graduates in FY 84, the highest percentage in the history of the All-Volunteer Force. In FY 83, the percentage was 91%, a record high at the time.

By the end of 1987 the Department of Defense (DoD) expects to have over 221,788 women on active duty. This would represent an increase of 41,788 women since 1980, bringing the total percentage of women to 9.9% compared to 9.0% in 1980. While the numbers of women in the Services continues to increase, the percentage of women is still approximately 10%.

The Coast Guard is part of the Department of Transportation. In time of war or national emergency, the Coast Guard could come under the control of the Secretary of the Navy, as directed by the President.

CURRENT RECRUITMENT STATISTICS

At the end of FY 84, the number of enlisted women in each of the services was as follows:

Total Active Forces 203,310 or 9.50%.
Army 66,100 or 10.05%.
Navy 42,258 or 8.60%.
Air Force 55,335 or 11.38%.
Marines 8,577 or 4.88%.
Coast Guard 2,108 or 6.60%.

The numbers below illustrate the differences in the number of female non-prior service recruits in FY 84 as compared to those in FY 83. Each of the Services made small increases in the numbers of female enlisted recruits in FY 84 except for the Navy and the Coast Guard.

Total Active Forces: 1,594 more (does not include Coast Guard data).
Army: 667 more.
Navy: 345 less.
Air Force: 324 more.
Marine Corps: 253 more.
Coast Guard: 173 less (includes regular enlistments and reserves).

The Services project that they will have the following enlisted female end strengths on duty at the close of FY 85 (end strength refers to the number of persons on duty at the end of a fiscal year or some specific stated time).

Army 67,900 or 10.2%.
Navy 44,300 or 8.9%.
Air Force 58,500 or 11.9%.
Marine Corps 8,659 or 4.83%.

FUTURE RECRUITMENT PROJECTIONS

The Army

The Army expects to raise the enlisted female end strength to 70,000 by the end of FY 87. This will amount to a probable increase of 1,000 women per year and is a reduction from a previous projection of 87,000 enlisted women by FY 87.

The Navy

The Navy's projected goal is 45,343 enlisted women by FY 87. This represents an increase of 5,385 from FY 83.

In December 1983, the Navy expanded the career opportunities for a limited number of women officers by authorizing the temporary assignment of helicopter pilots and explosive ordnance disposal officers to additional ships not expected to have a combat mission during the period of assignment. This move represents a limited expansion of opportunities for women because 1) the assignment of women is still subject to the discretion of the ship's commander who can refuse to allow women aboard and (2) it only allows temporary duty. Future recruitment projections for Navy women will increase only if the Navy adjusts its interpretation of the combat exclusion law to expand the number of ships on which women can serve. Otherwise the numbers will stay the same.

The Air Force

The Air Force started admitting women to the security police as of January 1, 1985. Of the 596,000 total jobs in the Air Force, approximately 60,000 have been closed to women under the Air Force's past interpretation of the combat exclusion law. It is estimated that the opening of the security police will result in 26,000 additional jobs for which women will be eligible.

The 1985 Defense Authorization Act contained a provision directing the Air Force to establish female accession goals of 19% in FY 87 and 22% in FY 88. In addition, the Secretary of Defense was directed to study and provide to Congress an analysis of the propensity of women to serve in the Air Force.

The Marine Corps

The Marine Corps projects an enlisted female end strength of 8,989 and 689 female officers by the end of FY 87. Therefore, the percentage of women in the Marine Corps continues to remain virtually the same at slightly under 5%.

The Coast Guard

The Coast Guard does not have a goal for the projected number of female accessions in future years.

RECRUITMENT POLICIES

Service standards are subject to change. Although all recruits for the Department of Defense and Coast Guard take the same entrance examination, higher scores are required by some Services for recruits in special categories (e.g., non-high school graduates) and for the more technical military jobs. (See definitions of AFQT and ASVAB below). Some vacancies are closed to women due to combat exclusion laws and policies.

The Army

The Army is currently not recruiting any Mental category IV females, but they are recruiting Mental category IV males who are high school diploma graduates, and who score a minimum of 16 on the AFQT.

Since 1981 the Army has required all women to have a high school diploma to enlist. Since 1981, Congress has required that 65% of all male enlistees have high school diplomas.

The Army currently prohibits the enlistment of women who hold General Educational Development (GED) certificates. (See definition below.)

The Navy

Non-prior service diploma graduates need a minimum score of 17 on the Armed Forces Qualification Test (AFQT) to enlist in the Navy.

All new female recruits must be high school graduates.

New recruits with a GED and non-graduate non-prior service male recruits need a AFQT score of 49 or better to enlist in the Navy.

The Air Force

Male and female GED holders need a score of 50 or better on the AFQT to enlist in the Air Force. Male and female high school graduates need a score of 21 or better on the AFQT to enlist in the Air Force.

Non-high school graduates need a score of 65 or better on the AFQT to enlist in the Air Force.

The Marine Corps

Female applicants need a high school diploma or equivalent education to enlist in the Marines. The GED is not considered equivalent; however, a year in an accredited college may be, at the discretion of the Marine Corps.

The Marines accept male applicants who have attended school through the 10th grade, and even this standard can be waived by the Marine Corps Commandant for an "exceptionally" qualified applicant.

Female high school graduates need a minimum AFQT score of 50, while male high school graduates need a score of only 21 to be accepted into the Marine Corps.

The Coast Guard

The Coast Guard has removed all restrictions based solely on gender in recruitment, training, assignment and career opportunities.

Male and female high school diploma graduates and those who possess GED equivalency certificates need a minimum score of 40 on the AFQT to enlist.

Combat exclusion laws and/or policies do not apply to the Coast Guard, which is part of the Department of Transportation (rather than DoD) in peacetime.

ABBREVIATIONS AND DEFINITIONS

AFQT: The Armed Forces Qualifications Test is a written test used by all branches of the Armed Services to determine the enlistment eligibility of personnel. The AFQT is derived from the ASVAB and consists of four subjects that measure basic verbal and quantitative abilities. The AFQT scores are used to classify potential enlistees in Mental Categories I through V. The Services actively recruit persons who score in Categories I, II and III. Congress has limited recruitment of persons who score in Category IV to 20% of enlistees. The Services do not enlist Category V.

II	65–92
IIIA	50–64
IIIB	31–49
IV	16–30
V	0–15

ASVAB: Armed Services Vocational Battery, a ten-part test given by the Services to determine eligibility for service. Scores on different aptitude composites of the ASVAB determine eligibility to enter specific military occupations.

GED Test: General Education Development Test, a five-part test given to determine if a person can be issued a high school equivalency diploma or certificate. The requirements for passing are determined by each State and vary widely.

Military Accession: New recruit.

NPS: Non-prior Service. No military service currently or at any time in the past.

WOMEN AND COMBAT: A COMPARISON OF THE SERVICES' LAWS AND POLICIES

Women are an integral part of today's All Volunteer Force However, the utilization of women by each branch of the Armed Forces differs based on each service's interpretation of combat exclusion laws and policies. There is little consistency among the services regarding the ways in which women are allowed to participate.

DEFINITION OF TERMS

Close combat

Close combat was defined by the Department of Defense in 1978 as "engaging an enemy with individual or crew-served weapons while being exposed to direct enemy fire, a high probability of direct physical contact with the enemy's personnel, and a substantial risk of capture." These positions are in the combat arm of each service. No women serve in positions considered to be "close combat."

Direct combat

Direct Combat was defined by the Department of the Army in 1982 as "engaging an enemy with individual or crew-served weapons while being exposed to direct enemy fire, a high probability of direct physical contact with the enemy's personnel, and a substantial risk of capture. Direct combat takes place while closing with the enemy by fire, maneuver, or shock effect in order to destroy or capture him, or while repelling his assault by fire, close combat or counterattack." Army women are not permanently assigned in direct combat positions.

Combat support

The combat support positions provide operational assistance to the combat arm. Examples of operational assistance include direct engineering, police, communications and intelligence support. Women in the Army and Air Force serve in combat support roles and specialties; Marine Corps women do not. Navy women are prohibited from permanent assignment to underway replenishment ships that support the battle group.

Combat service support

Combat service support positions provide logistical, technical and administrative services to the combat arm. Military women in all branches serve in combat service support roles.

STATUTORY RESTRICTIONS ON WOMEN IN COMBAT

10 United States Code Section 8549 prohibits the permanent assignment of female members of the Air Force, except those designated under Secion 8067 (medical, dental, chaplain and other "professionals"), to duty in aircraft engaged in combat mission.

10 United States Code Section 6015 prohibits the permanent assignment of female members of the Navy to duty on vessels or on aircraft which can be expected to be engaged in combat mission. The Marine Corps falls under the Department of Navy and adheres to the restrictions of Section 6015. In addition, the Marine Corps further restricts women from serving in combat units or combat "situations."

10 United States Code Section 3012 provides that the Secretary of the Army may assign, detail and prescribe the duties of members of the Army. The Army has determined its policies regarding the role of women by attempting to remain consistent with the "intent of Congress" when the combat exclusion laws were established for the Navy and Air Force.

VARIATIONS AMONG THE SERVICES

The variations among services are best illustrated by looking at their policies of assigning women to ships, planes, missile crews and positions on the battlefield.

Ships

Coast Guard women serve on all ships in the Coast Guard Fleet and in all positions including the command of ships. The Coast Guard has no restrictions based solely on gender in assignment, training, recruitment or career opportunities.

The Coast Guard is part of the Department of Transportation in peacetime, but would come under the control of the Secretary of the Navy in time of war. The Coast Guard does not consider itself bound by the provisions of 10 USC Section 6015.

The only ships to which the Navy permanently assigns women are combat service support ships such as repair (tenders) and research ships. Navy women are not permanently assigned to the combat support ships such as the underway replenishment ships of the Mobile Logistic Support Force.

When a Navy task force is deployed, support ships such as oilers, store ships and ammunition ships accompany the Navy's battle ships. The support ships that replenish the task force are deployed from either the Mobile Logistic Support Force (MLSF) or the Military Sealift Command (MSC) depending on which has the needed support availabale and ready to serve. The MLSF consists of only Navy ships.

The Military Sealift Command is composed of civilian contract ships such as Merchant Marine ships. Since these are civilian ships, there is no restriction on the participation of women. As a result, civilian women are sailing on MSC ships and serving with the Navy's battle group.

Aircraft

Although women can be pilots and navigators in the Army, Air Force and Navy, there are variations among these services regarding the assignment of women to various types of aircraft. In general, women fly combat support aircraft such as cargo planes, refueling planes, AWACs and certain helicopters. However, they are prohibited from permanent assignment to fighter jets. All pilot and navigator positions in the Marine Corps are closed to women.

Missile crews

The Air Force now assigns women to all missile crews. A recent policy change allows women to be assigned to the two-person crews of the Minuteman Missile System from which they were previously barred, as long as both members of the crew are of the same gender. Women are assigned to the four-person Titan missile crews, and will serve there until the missile system is retired in 1987.

Army women are prohibited from assignment to short range missile systems. However, women are assigned to long range missile systems such as the Pershing and Nike-Hercules.

The missile systems in the Navy are found on submarines. Submarines are considered combatant ships by the Navy, and no Navy women serve on them.

Battlefield location

The Army is the only service that restricts the assignment of women by battlefield location. The Army uses a Direct Combat Probability Coding (DCPC) system to determine the probability of engaging in direct combat for every position in the Army. Seven codes are used to classify jobs; code 1 represents a high combat probability and code 7 represents no direct combat probability.

Current Army policy prohibits the permanent assignment of women to positions coded P1. While women are barred from assignment to positions expected to engage in direct combat, the DCPC system does not prevent the permanent assignment of women to combat support and combat service support positions that may routinely bring them into the P1 location on the battlefield.

SENATOR McCLURE RIGHT ON THE MARK

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, today's Wall Street Journal carries a letter to the editor from Senator McCLURE in response to one of that newspaper's articles on Federal spending and the deficit. In editorials and columns, the Journal persists in some very wrongheaded arguments about the expenditure side of the Federal budget, stoutly defending mammoth defense increases as if they had no effect on the deficit, largely ignoring entitlements, and concentrating their scorn on annually funded discretionary programs. And, oh yes, promoting the sham of a line-item veto that addresses neither revenue losing tax loopholes or entitlement spending as the savior of us all.

Senator McCLURE knows better, and has written an excellent rebuttal to the Journal's April 16 article, "The Spending Problem in Profile." I ask unanimous consent that his letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SACRED COWS BEEF UP THE DEFICIT

In "The Spending Problem in Profile" (editorial page, April 16) Doug Bandow of the Cato Institute—which represents a radical libertarian position—criticized conservatives for failing to take a meat ax and blindly truncate discretionary programs to balance the budget.

If the people at Cato had their way, they would eliminate all discretionary government spending for cancer research, the Drug Enforcement Agency, the national forests, NASA, and the Centers for Disease Control. They would carelessly cut all investments in our future to realize short-term benefits.

But would this be the responsible way to get federal spending under control? Does it attack the source of the problem? Should Congress follow the search-and-destroy tactics advocated by the Cato Institute?

The Institute grossly fails to understand that the budget is in deficit not because Congress has failed to make cuts in discretionary programs, but because it has been unable to cut the growth in the entitlement—or formula—programs, which are expanding automatically every year beyond our ability to pay for them.

Since President Reagan was elected Congress has cut back spending for discretionary programs from 26% of the federal budget to just 15%. And it will support further reductions this year.

Contrary to the misinformation by Cato, the subcommittee which I chair has substantially reduced federal spending. Since 1980, more than $4 billion has been cut from the Department of Energy budget. This includes the Fossil Energy Research and Development budget, which has been reduced from $836 million in 1980 to $274 million this year. Energy conservation has been reduced from $751 million in 1980 to $451 million this year. And the $1 billion Fossil Energy Construction budget has been reduced to zero.

At the same time, spending for formula programs—such as Social Security, other retirement programs, Medicare, Medicaid, housing assistance, student loans, and income-transfer programs—continues to escalate virtually unchecked, although the rate of increase has been reduced slightly. In the past four years, spending for formula programs has increased from about $277 billion to nearly $400 billion.

While Congress has supported cost-cutting measures in discretionary programs, it has clearly failed to make similar curbs on the increases in formula programs, which are considered sacred cows.

Conservatives refuse to raise taxes any higher to pay for an increase in the automatically growing formula programs, while liberals are unwilling to slow the growth. The difference between these two positions can be measured by the size of the deficit—now more than $200 billion. Even if Congress decided to eliminate every discretionary program—about $150 billion—the budget would still not be balanced.

Not all the blame for the deficit, however, rests on Congress. While the administration seeks to further reduce discretionary spending, it continues to allow the formula programs to mushroom exponentially.

The "Rule of 72" points out how fast a budget will expand. Dividing 72 by the rate of growth gives the number of years it will take for a program to double in cost. Formula programs are still automatically expanding by over 10% a year. This means the formula programs now are doubling in cost in less than seven years.

No one would advocate that Congress and the administration eliminate the formula programs in order to balance the budget. However, it is essential to slow the rate they automatically grow year after year.

Four years ago, President Reagan declared war on federal spending. Since then, substantial cuts have been made in discretionary programs, which offer less political resistance. But little more can be squeezed out in these areas. The president and Congress must come to grips with the growth in formula programs.

The Cato Institute has completely missed this point. Instead, it has turned its sights on conservatives because, in Cato's opinion, they do not buckle under and slash all spending in the discretionary programs.

The Cato Institute is suffering from an acute case of selective myopia. Like the administration, it fails to focus on the portion of the federal budget that is primarily responsible for the continuing deficit.

JAMES A. MCCLURE,
U.S. Senate.

S. 1047—BENEFITS TO FORMER PRESIDENTS ACT

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senators CHILES and PRYOR as an original cosponsor of the Former Presidents Facilities and Services Reform Act of 1985. I have been working with my colleagues for several years on this legislation and last year we reported it out of the Committee on Governmental Affairs for the first time since the bill's initial introduction in 1980. I congratulate them for their commitment to enacting this important legislation and I am confident that we will finally see it signed into law this year.

Mr. President, the taxpayers pay for a wide range of benefits intended for the support of our former Presidents, everything from 24-hour, round-the-clock Secret Service protection to the provision of office space and equipment. The level of these benefits has grown tremendously over the last two decades to the point that many are asking whether we have created an "Imperial Ex-Presidency."

We do not intend by introducing this legislation to in any way tarnish or downgrade the dignity that should be accorded to our former Presidents. Dignity and opulence are not equivalent, however, and it is appropriate to revise the laws authorizing benefits to former Presidents to ensure that the levels of support are not out of proportion to the duties of the ex-Presidency.

We do not enrich the institution of the ex-Presidency if we provide unrestrained or excessive benefits and funding. Ironically, especially in these times of extremely tight budgets, we could cheapen it in the eyes of the taxpayer by not putting spending restraints in these laws as we are throughout the rest of the budget.

Mr. President, the laws providing support to our former Presidents were originally designed to assist each former President in leading a dignified retired life, free from the need to "commercialize" the institution of the Presidency. However, the cost of these programs has gone from $65,000 in 1955 to $6.3 million in 1975 to over $27 million in 1984. This fourfold increase greatly exceeds the original expectations Congress had for these programs.

The Former Presidents Facilities and Services Reform Act of 1985 is intended to put limits on these increasing costs while maintaining a reasonable amount of support to assist former Presidents in responding to the public and fulfilling their roles as elder statesmen and advisers to the Government and to our citizens. It would also accomplish three additional objectives of equal importance.

First, it will restore the original intent of the former President's programs: to ensure that former Presidents can live dignified retired lives free from the need to demean their status or the institution of the Presidency. Originally, the programs were established for former Presidents like Harry Truman who was severely pressed financially just to handle the mail, telephone calls and requests for speeches he received once he retired from office. They were not intended to create extensive and costly offices and staff to support our former Presidents nor to establish a formal "Office of the Ex-Presidency."

Second, our living former Presidents have done quite well financially once they have left office. Although they deserve to receive some support to respond to the requests of the public that arise as a result of their experience and knowledge as former Presidents, such support should be carefully controlled and offered in a coordinated fashion. The existing laws supporting our past Presidents do not establish limits on the level of benefits to be provided. Our legislation would establish such limits and ensure that benefits for our former Presidents are seen as a part of a comprehensive package, permitting the Congress and the public to better judge the sufficiency and costs of these programs.

Third, by a gradually scaling back benefits and curbing the growth of support programs for former Presidents, the Former President's Facilities and Services Reform Act responds to the public's concern that all Federal programs must be carefully scrutinized and controlled in order to reduce the deficit. A former President has no official statutory responsibilities or duties. Yet, he receives a staff, an office and around-the-clock Secret Service protection. In many ways, he continues to receive all the benefits that a sitting President receives without any of the responsibilities and these benefits have become increasingly costly.

Mr. President, the proper role of former Presidents has been an issue that has faced this country since the days of the earliest Presidents. In those days, former Presidents usually retired to private life upon leaving the duties of office. Today, the pressures upon that role have changed and former Presidents now have much more visibility when they retire.

Given the fact that the taxpayers have, in effect, become guardians and supporters of our former Presidents, however, a careful and prudent balance must be struck between the legitimate support a former President needs to continue to fulfill his responsibilities to the public, and the taxpayers' interest in minimizing excessive Federal spending. Our legislation is designed to strike such a balance and replaces the sometimes conflicting, increasingly costly and open-ended laws currently governing benefit programs for former Presidents with a more prudent and limited benefit structure.

Mr. President, our legislation has three titles, each designed to reform a category of benefits or support for former Presidents. Title I puts limits into place to control the future maintenance and operation costs of the libraries dedicated to former Presidents. Currently, libraries are built to honor former Presidents using privately donated funds. These libraries are then turned over to the Federal Government which transfers the official papers of each President to his library and pays the costs of running the facilities.

These libraries are used by scholars and are visited by the public and currently cost approximately $14 million to run annually. During the hearings on the Library Act of 1955, which established the system of Presidential libraries we have today, it was estimated that only $100,000 a year would be needed to run each library. Today, that cost exceeds $1.5 million on average per facility and it is still growing. The need for controls is obvious.

Our bill would prohibit the Archivist of the United States from accepting any new presidential library unless those private groups financing its construction also provide an endowment equal to 20 percent of the construction and land acquisition costs of the facility. This endowment would be put into a special account by the Archivist to earn interest and would be used to pay for a large share of the operations and maintenance costs of each library.

Because the larger sized facilities are usually the most expensive to heat and cool, repair and operate, our legislation also provides that endowment size would be increased proportionate to any increase in floor size over 70,000 square. In other words, a 105,000 square foot facility would require an endowment of 30 percent of the construction costs of the facility—105,000 square feet is an increase in size of 50 percent over 70,000 square feet, so the endowment is 20 percent multiplied by 1.5 or 30 percent. This provision will discourage private sector donors from constructing grandiose, expensive, and hard to maintain facilities.

Title II of our bill will put limitations into place to control the costs of providing office space, equipment, and staff for former Presidents. There currently are no statutory ceilings on expenses incurred by former Presidents for such things as postage, telephone service, and supplies and equipment. Instead, funding for virtually all of these services is provided with only vague statutory guidance. Only the pensions and office staff provided to former Presidents are subjected to any statutory limitation.

Our legislation will reduce these costs and set limits for the future by establishing a firm cost cap on all such activities, excluding pensions, and gradually reducing them over time. The bill caps all expenses for offices, staff, and related support at $300,000 for each President and reduces this amount in stages over a period of 9 years to a ceiling of $200,000. It also limits the size of the offices provided to former Presidents, requires that they be located in existing federally leased or owned office space, and prevents any of these funds from being used on partisan political matters or to make a financial gain for a former President.

Finally, title III of the bill provides that former Presidents will no longer be entitled to 24-hour, round-the-clock Secret Service protection for their entire lives. Instead, it limits full-time protection by the Secret Service to the first 5 years of a President's retirement. Thereafter, protection could be reinstated by the Secretary of the Treasury for 1-year intervals and the sitting President is authorized to provide emergency protection for short periods of time when the threat warrants it.

In effect, our bill establishes it as Federal policy that former Presidents should be protected but the need for the protection should be routinely reviewed and terminated when it is no longer required. Former President Nixon's recent decision to cancel Secret Service protection in July of this year lends some support to this view. There are also reports that former President Ford is considering requesting that his protection be canceled.

I ask that a copy of President Nixon's letter to the Treasury Secretary requesting the termination of Secret Service protection be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, Senators CHILES and PRYOR and I have worked for several years on this legislation. We have consulted closely with the administration and believe we have developed a workable and fair approach to this problem. The bill we have developed will ensure that benefit programs for former Presidents are well coordinated, more cost-effective, and subject to some carefully defined limits. In the current budget climate, these programs, like all others in the budget, must be subject to strong cost discipline and effective controls. I believe our bill is an important step in curbing costs in this area and urge my colleagues to give it their strong support.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK CITY,
March 7, 1985.

Hon. JAMES BAKER III,
Department of the Treasury.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This is to advise that I am aware that pursuant to section 3056, title 18, United States Code, the Secret Service is authorized to provide for my protection as a former President. Notwithstanding this authorization it is my desire that such protection be permanently terminated at 11:59 p.m., July 31, 1985. Effective with this termination of protection, I relieve the Secret Service of its responsibility to provide for my personal protection.

Sincerely,

RICHARD NIXON.

AGRICULTURAL EXPORT ENHANCEMENT AND SOIL CONSERVATION ACT 1985

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, yesterday I introduced a bill, the Agricultural Export Enhancement and Soil Conservation Act of 1985. This act will be an important part of the efforts in the Senate to place American agriculture on a sound economic basis.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1050

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of American in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Agricultural Export Enhancement and Soil Conservation Act of 1985".

TITLE I—PROTECTION OF EXPORTS

SEC. 101. (a) Section 6 of the Export Administration Act of 1979 (50 U.S.C. App. 2405) is amended by—

(1) adding at the end of subsection (a)(1) the following: "The President may impose or propose to extend export controls under this section on agricultural commodities, other than in connection with the prohibition or curtailment of all exports, in accordance with the procedures set forth in subsection (l) and the other requirements of this section."; and

(2) adding at the end thereof a new subsection (l) as follows:

"(l) AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES.—(1) If the President imposes export controls or proposes to extend export controls that have been imposed, on any agricultural commodity to carry out the policy set forth in paragraph (2)(B), (2)(C), (7), or (8) of section 3 of this Act, the President shall immediately transmit a report on such action to Congress, setting forth the reasons therefor, in detail, and specifying the length of time the controls are proposed to be in effect which may not exceed six months.

"(2) In the case of export controls imposed by the President—

"(A) if Congress, within sixty days after the date of its receipt of the report under paragraph (1), adopts a joint resolution pursuant to paragraph (4) approving the imposition of export controls, then such controls shall remain in effect for the period specified in the report, for six months after the close of the sixty-day period, or until terminated by the President, whichever occurs first; or

"(B) if Congress, within sixty days after the date of its receipt of such report, fails to adopt a joint resolution approving such controls, then such controls shall cease to be effective upon the expiration of such sixty-day period.

"(3) In the case of export controls proposed to be extended—

"(A) if Congress adopts a joint resolution approving a proposed extension of export controls prior to the expiration of the applicable period described in paragraph (2)(A) or this subparagraph, then such controls shall be extended for the period specified in the report, for six months after the date of enactment of the joint resolution of approval, or until terminated by the President, whichever occurs first; or

"(B) if Congress fails to adopt a joint resolution approving a proposed extension of controls prior to the expiration of the applicable period described in paragraph (2)(A) or subparagraph (A) of this paragraph, then such controls shall cease to be effective upon the expiration of the applicable period.

"(4)(A) For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'resolution' means only a joint resolution the matter after the resolving clause of which is as follows: 'That, pursuant to section 6(l) of the Export Administration Act of 1979, the President may impose, expand, or extend export controls as specified in the report to Congress on .', with the blank space being filled with the appropriate date.

"(B) On the day on which a report is submitted to the House of Representatives and the Senate under paragraph (1), a resolution with respect to such report shall be introduced (by request) in the House by the majority leader and minority leader of the House, for himself and the minority leader of the House, or by Members of the House designated by the majority leader and minority leader of the House; and shall be introduced (by request) in the Senate by the majority leader of the Senate, for himself and the minority leader of the Senate, or by Members of the Senate designated by the majority leader and minority leader of the Senate. "(iii) Debate in the Senate on any debatable motion or appeal in connection with such a resolution shall be limited to not more than one hour, to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the mover and the manager of the resolution, except that in the event the manager of the resolution is in favor of any such motion or appeal, the time in opposition thereto, shall be controlled by the minority leader or his designee. Such leaders, or either of them, may, from time under their control on the passage of such a resolution, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of a debatable motion or appeal.

"(iv) A motion in the Senate to further limit debate on such a resolution, debatable motion, or appeal is not debatable. No amendment to, or motion to recommit, such a resolution is in order in the Senate.

"(G) In the case of the resolution described in subparagraph (A), if prior to the passage by one House of a resolution of that House, that House receives a resolution with respect to the same matter from the other House, then—

"(i) the procedure in that House shall be the same as if no resolution had been received from the other House; but

"(ii) the vote on final passage shall be on the resolution of the other House.".

(b) Section 7(a)(1) of the Export Administration Act of 1979 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The President may impose, expand, or extend export controls under this section with respect to agricultural commodities only as provided in section 6(l).".

TITLE II—BONUS COMMODITY EXPORTS

SEC. 201. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law and in addition to any authority granted to the Secretary of Agriculture or the Commodity Credit Corporation under any other provision of law, the Secretary shall use "bonus commodities" from the Commodity Credit Corporation acquired through its price support operations, to the extent they are available, and shall provide such commodities at no cost to United States exporters, users, and foreign purchasers to offset the adverse effects of export subsidies of competing exporting countries and to offset disadvantages for United States agricultural commodity exports due to the low value of foreign currencies in relation to the United States dollar.

(b) The Secretary shall calculate the estimated annual storage, interest, and handling costs of those Commodity Credit Corporation stocks that the Secretary determines to be in excess of those Commodity Credit Corporation stocks which, together with domestic commercial stocks, are in an adequate carryover status, and declare an amount of such excess stocks, equal to the calculated total costs of the storage, interest, and handling costs of all stocks the Secretary determines to be in excess, to be bonus commodities available for export under this section. The Secretary shall use a minimum of one-third of such bonus commodities each year for the purposes set forth in subsection (a) and, if the Secretary fails to do so, the Secretary shall report to the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry of the Senate, the reasons therefor.

TITLE III—FINANCING OF SALES OF AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

SEC. 301. (a) Effective with respect to the fiscal years beginning October 1, 1985, and ending September 30, 1989, the Secretary of Agriculture shall use funds of the Commodity Credit Corporation under the CCC Export Credit Sales Program (GSM-5) for export credit for surplus commodities in any year that the carryover stocks of those commodities exceeds the level provided for in paragraph (b) of this section. Such credit shall be limited to sales of those commodities determined to be in excess of reserve requirements. The Secretary of Agriculture shall set rates of interest for credit under this program at a level that will offset changes in the value of the dollar relative to other currencies since 1981.

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture shall make such credits available for exports of feed grains whenever carryover stocks exceed 1.7 billion bushels and for exports of wheat whenever carryover stocks exceed 1 billion bushels.

TITLE IV—PROTECTION OF HIGHLY ERODIBLE LAND

SEC. 401. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) and notwithstanding any other provision of law, following the date of enactment of this Act, any person who produces an agricultural commodity on highly erodible land shall be ineligible, for—

(1) any type of price or income support assistance made available under the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1421 et seq.), the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act (15 U.S.C. 714 et seq.), or any other Act;

(2) a loan for the construction or purchase of a facility for the storage of such commodity made under section 4(h) of the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act (15 U.S.C. 714b(h));

(3) crop insurance under the Federal Crop Insurance Act (7 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.);

(4) a disaster payment made under the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1421 et seq.); or

(5) a new loan made, insured, or guaranteed under the Consolidated Farm and

Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1921 et seq.) or any other provision of law administered by the Farmers Home Administration, if the Secretary determines that such loan will be used for a purpose that will contribute to excessive erosion of highly erodible land.

(b) Subsection (a) shall not apply to—

(1) any agricultural commodity planted by a person before the date of enactment of this Act;

(2) any agricultural commodity planted by a person during any crop year beginning before the date of enactment of this Act;

(3) any loan described in subsection (a) made before the date of enactment of this Act; or

(4) any agricultural commodity produced using a conservation system that has been approved by a conservation district and that is based on technical standards set forth in the Soil Conservation Service technical guide for that conservation district. In areas where no conservation district exists, the Secretary shall determine the adequacy of the conservation system to be used in the production of any agricultural commodity on highly erodible land.

TITLE V—EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 501. Except as otherwise provided herein, the provisions of this Act shall become effective October 1, 1985.

SENATOR ROBERT C. BYRD, RECIPIENT, 1984 AWARD FOR LIFE SERVICE TO VETERANS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, on Tuesday evening, April 30, this Senator was privileged to participate in a ceremony that honored one of our most distinguished colleagues. In the splendid setting of the Russell Senate Caucus Room, members of the Paralyzed Veterans of America and the Vietnam Veterans Institute, along with friends, well-wishers, and representatives from both the Senate and the House, gathered to say thank you to a man who truly cares—the distinguished minority leader, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD.

Ever since my good friend from West Virginia first came to Capitol Hill, he has been one of the true guardians of the welfare of our veterans. Year in and year out, Mr. BYRD has been at the forefront of legislation that, above all, guarantees that those Americans who gave so much in defense of our cherished freedom will never be forgotten.

In recognition of the Senator's longtime devotion to this worthy effort, the veterans' groups presented the distinguished minority leader with their 1984 Award for Life Service to Veterans—a wonderful portrait to our gentleman friend from West Virginia.

Mr. President, it is fitting that in this time of remembrance of our national agony in Southeast Asia, we take pride in knowing that the distinguished Senator from West Virginia made sure that, even in the dark days of an unpopular war, Congress did not turn its back on our fighting men.

In my view, it is men like ROBERT C. BYRD who deserve real credit for turning this country around on Vietnam, and restoring dignity and pride to the brave vets who fought so well for their country. There may not have been brass bands or cheering thousands for our returning Vietnam veterans, but there was always the strong hand of support extended by Mr. BYRD.

As a World War II veteran, the Senator from Kansas would like to thank the distinguished minority leader for his good work on behalf of the American soldier; and as a colleague, I would like to thank him for his wisdom.

Mr. President, it was an honor to share the stage during Tuesday evening's tribute with so many distinguished colleagues from both parties and from both Houses: Vice President George Bush; Senator STROM THURMOND, President pro tempore of the Senate; Senator ALAN SIMPSON; assistant majority leader and former chairman of the Senate Veterans Committee and currently a key member of that committee; Senator ALAN CRANSTON, Senate minority whip, and ranking Democrat, Senate Veterans' Committee; Senator FRANK MURKOWSKI, chairman, Senate Veterans' Committee; Senator JAY ROCKEFELLER, member, Senate Veterans' Committee; and Representative SONNY MONTGOMERY, chairman, House Veterans' Affairs Committee.

I ask unanimous consent that the following highlights of Mr. BYRD's award ceremony be printed in the RECORD:

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESENTATION STATEMENTS

PARALYZED VETERANS OF AMERICA

Paralyzed Veterans of America takes great pride in participating with the Vietnam Veterans Institute in recognizing the contributions of Senator Robert C. Byrd. The presentation of the Award for Life Service to Veterans is a token of our appreciation of the Senator's long standing commitment to the veterans of this nation.

Senator Robert Byrd's advocacy for programs and benefits for veterans has been of particular significance to the members of Paralyzed Veterans of America. PVA's members, all of whom have experienced spinal cord injury or dysfunction, utilize the broad spectrum of services conducted by the Veterans Administration,. Of greatest importance to PVA's members, and millions of other veterans across the nation, has been Senator Byrd's active and vigorous support of a viable VA health-care system which is capable of meeting the many needs of America's veterans.

Paralyzed Veterans of America, through its conduct of programs in Service, Advocacy, Legislation, and Research, realizes that the needs of America's veterans are many and diverse. It is for this reason PVA sincerely enjoys this opportunity to demonstrate our gratitude to an individual who has consistently been a leading proponent of many meaningful programs for veterans.

The career of Senator Robert Byrd, both as Majority and Minority Leader of the United States Senate, is deserving of the highest accolades. His willingness to listen to and judge issues based upon merit is representative of his service to West Virginia, America's veterans, and the nation, itself.

Again, on behalf of the 11,000 members of Paralyzed Veterans of America, it is a pleasure to join with the Vietnam Veterans Institute in saluting Senator Robert C. Byrd and honoring him with the 1984 Award for Life Service to Veterans.

RICHARD D. HOOVER,
President,
Paralyzed Veterans of America.

VIETNAM VETERANS INSTITUTE

The Vietnam Veterans Institute is proud to join with the Paralyzed Veterans of America this year, in presenting the Award for Life Service to Veterans to the Honorable Robert C. Byrd.

The Award is non-partisan and is intended to pay tribute to outstanding Americans who, through public or volunteer service, have consistently contributed to the well being of American veterans. It is an award for loyalty. The kind of loyalty that works to assure that the needs of American veterans are not overlooked, once the nation's need for their loyalty, while in uniform, has passed.

Robert C. Byrd is such an American. Since 1959 (the 86th Congress) he has introduced or supported 66 pieces of legislation on behalf of the veterans of this nation. In his legislative support, he has taken on the tough issues as well as supported the popular ones. In 1965, he backed legislation prohibiting the closing of 11 VA hospitals. Throughout his career, from the FHA mortgage program, to education and training benefits, to cost of living increases in pensions, Robert Byrd has been consistent.

For Vietnam veterans alone, he has supported the Emergency Employment Act of 1971, the Vietnam Era Veterans Readjustment Assistance Act of 1972, Health Care Expansion Acts, as well as Drug & Alcohol treatment and Rehab programs. In 1974, he overrode a presidential veto to assure the Vietnam Veterans Education Act became law. In 1984, he took on the hard and controversial task of supporting an Agent Orange Compensation bill.

In 1983, he also secured passage of his amendment to authorize a bronze medal to be presented to the next of kin of those Americans missing or unaccounted for in southeast Asia.

In our dealings with him, he has been accessible, accommodating and open in his agreement, and just as importantly, open in his disagreement. It is with great pleasure that the Paralyzed Veterans of America and the Vietnam Veterans Institute unveil a portrait of a gentleman, and our recipient of the 1984 Award for Life Service to Veterans.

JERRY E. YATES.
President,
Vietnam Veterans Institute.

A MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—AS READ BY VICE PRESIDENT BUSH

Mr. BUSH. Ladies and Gentleman, I have the honor of reading a letter from our President that says:

Dear Bob. I am pleased to send my congratulations as you are honored by the Paralyzed Vietnam Veterans Institute Board of Directors at the unveiling of your portrait. It is truly fitting that such an honor is being bestowed on you, for you have devoted so much of your time and energy as a Senator to those who have served our Nation on the field of battle.

Nancy joins me in sending you our very best wishes.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

And I would add, for the President of the Senate, and my wife Barbara, we feel exactly the same way.

EXCERPTS FROM COLLEAGUES' TRIBUTES

Senator THURMOND. Bob Byrd is a true statesman. West Virginia can be proud of him. The Nation can be proud of him. And for all he's done for the veterans, I know they're proud of him. As you know, Bob, when you work for the veterans, you're working for the people who saved this Nation. The men who wore the uniform or the women who wore the uniform are responsible for our freedom today. To our veterans, I can only say you could not have selected a finer person to receive this outstanding award than Bob Byrd.

Senator SIMPSON. It is a deep privilege to be here tonight. Robert Byrd is an extraordinary man, and we are all awed by his prowess and his skills. And to the Vietnam veterans group, I commend you all for your recognition of this great leader. During the time he was majority leader, the Congress passed an amazing array of legislation for the Vietnam veteran. He has shown his full awareness of America's historic obligation to its veterans.

Senator CRANSTON. Too often in our business the hard work that individual Members do in the Congress gets lost in the shuffle, and they don't receive recognition, or enough recognition for their efforts. For not allowing that to happen in the case of Robert Byrd and his work on behalf of veterans, I congratulate all of you and the Vietnam Institute Board of Directors and the Paralyzed Veterans of America. I know of no Senator who has been more steadfast in support of all the right things for veterans.

Senator MURKOWSKI. I think it's appropriate to recognize the solid support of America's veterans which Senator Robert Byrd has demonstrated over the years. He is a man who has never forgotten where the Nation's strength lies, and who through his own selfless work in the Senate, has proven to be a great contributor to a strong America.

Senator ROCKEFELLER. To serve as a junior colleague to Senator Byrd is an experience. He has a great deal of skill and majesty in this complex and excellent Senate. I am proud to be his junior colleague, and look forward to being in that position for many years to come. God bless you, Senator Byrd, for all that you've done for the veterans and for what they this evening are doing for you.

Representative SONNY MONTGOMERY. As far as I know, Senator Byrd has never voted against a veterans' bill and I doubt if he ever will. Robert Byrd has been instrumental in securing funding for VA programs both in West Virginia and across the Nation-especially for the establishment of the new State medical schools at VA hospitals.

I express my pleasure at being able to be with you tonight in paying high tribute to a true friend of West Virginia veterans, of all veterans, and all Americans, Senator Robert C. Byrd.

ACCEPTANCE REMARKS: SENATOR ROBERT C. BYRD

To a large degree, world history has been written on the battlefield. The Trojan War, the Punic wars, the campaigns of Alexander and Napoleon, World Wars I and II and the Vietnam and Korean conflicts—in those mighty clashes. Empires have risen and fallen, and destiny has been changed. And for centuries after, historians and poets glorify the kings, generals, admirals, and marshalls who led the armies or commanded the navies.

Unfortunately, however, battles are fought mostly by private soldiers, sailors, and airmen—men in many cases who, in Abraham Lincoln's words, "gave the last full measure of devotion." But more often, survivors of those conflicts must go on suffering from their wounds an disabilities long after the guns have fallen silent, and the flags have been stored away.

In that regard, an old epigram says, "Nothing is so neglected as a chimney after a house burns down, or a soldier after the battle is won." Too often in the past, that saying was shamefully true. In war after war, men were called from peaceful pursuits to defend their country, and if they were fortunate enough to survive, they were sent home to fend for themselves, whatever their condition.

Some generations ago, that neglect was only too obvious. All across our country, many towns and communities included their share of dramatically disabled veterans—the old soldier hobbling about on a wooden pegleg, the Union Army veteran with the empty shirt sleeve, or the broken doughboy who had been gassed in the trenches of 1918. To America's shame, men who had literally sacrificed "the best years of their lives" for their country, were left to knit what remained of those lives together in the best ways they could.

Fortunately, recent generations of Americans have awakened to their duty to those who have given so much to keep our country free and strong. Most Americans realize what kind of world this would be if Hitler had won World War II, or if communism had been allowed to spread unchallenged across continent after continent. Our freedom and the security of our way of life depend on those who have served in our military forces—the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, and others—and most Americans know that we owe those men and women lasting gratitude.

I am glad that Congress has, over the years, enacted legislation to make that gratitude real—to plan programs and provide opportunities to try to repay veterans for the years in which they exchanged their civilian clothes for uniforms, and to ensure that the wounded and disabled be given a chance for a better life, thus fulfilling the duty of a grateful country toward those of our young men and women who have helped make and keep this the greatest Nation in the world. In this regard, I am supportive of legislation to upgrade the non-competitive entry level for Vietnam veterans in the Federal civil service system. Further, in recognition of the brave men who honorably gave their all for our country in Vietnam, I have today introduced a resolution to make May 7 Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day, marking the 10-year anniversary of the official end of America's involvement in its longest war.

Today, I thank the Vietnam Veterans Institute and the Paralyzed Veterans of America for the honor they have bestowed on me in this award. I hope that a grateful Nation's contributions to our veterans have helped in part to repay them for their sacrifices. And in the years to come, we shall continue to work to see that our country keeps faith with those who stood in the ranks to protect us against our enemies and to ensure that our children and grandchildren might enjoy the privilege of being proud, free Americans.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas would like to also pay tribute to the very talented artist who created the award portrait. Tom Nielson can be tremendously proud of his wonderful work of art which captures so well the character of the distinguished minority leader.

I would also salute the many veterans who attended the ceremony. Their very presence was a true testament to the esteem that they have for Senator BYRD and a tribute to his dedication to their lives. American veterans, from every war, hold a special place in American society. And men like Senator BYRD will always see to it that their place is secure.

VIETNAM VETERANS RECOGNITION DAY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I call up Calendar No. 94, Senate Joint Resolution 128, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. the joint resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S.J. Res. 128) to designate May 7, 1985, as "Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I want to thank the distinguished majority leader for calling up this resolution. I also thank him for his cosponsorship of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there amendments to the text of the resolution?

Mr. BYRD. No. Mr. President, the amendment to the preamble, of course, will not be read until after action on the resolution takes place. I do have a brief statement, if the Chair will indulge me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this resolution is long overdue and is a symbol of my concern that our Nation's Vietnam veterans be afforded the recognition they are due for their patriotic service.

Next Tuesday, May 7, 1985, marks the 10th anniversary of the official end of America's involvement in the conflict in Vietnam. Some 3.4 million American men and women served in the Vietnam theatre during that long war—the longest conflict this Nation has been involved in since we gained our independence. More than 57,000 Americans lost their lives there, and an additional 2,400 Americans are still listed missing in action in Southeast Asia. Some 300,000 were wounded and some 75,000 have incurred permanent physical disabilities as a result of their service.

Regardless of the ultimate verdict of history about U.S. involvement in that war, the service that patriotic Americans performed is deserving of their country's recognition.

Mr. President, the Nation is now beginning to review in a more dispassionate and even-handed manner the history of our involvement in the Vietnam conflict. We are still learning the lessons of that conflict. For too long we have taken the painless road of avoiding that history. It is a healthy sign, I believe, that there has been a recent upsurge in commentary and analysis of our role in Vietnam. If we cannot examine our past, then we will be unable to chart our future with wisdom.

It is, then, appropriate that we now take steps to honor our veterans, and the memory of those who did not return from Vietnam. This resolution would designate next Tuesday, May 7th, as "Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day." It is a modest measure, but an essential step in the healing process which is so important for our country.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader for permitting me, and others, to cosponsor his resolution. I believe this is a fitting tribute. I commend the minority leader, and others, Vietnam veterans and others, who have sought this initiative.

I am pleased to cosponsor and support Senate Joint Resolution 128, to denote May 7 as Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day.

Although we have not yet fully resolved our national debate about the Vietnam war and our involvement in it, there is one aspect of the war on which there should be bipartisan, indeed unanimous, agreement—that the more than 3 million Americans who served our country in the Vietnam theater did so with honor, with distinction, and in a manner consistent with the highest traditions of our military services.

Some 57,000 of those service men and women lost their lives doing their duty. Two thousand four hundred of them are still listed as missing in action, and we must continue to demand from the Communist authorities in Indochina a complete accounting for them. Tens of thousands of others suffered injury, some of them permanently disabling injury, which has altered their lives.

And all of those who served—including those who were fortunate enough to have escaped death or injury—sacrificed greatly for their country, in ways that only other combat veterans can fully appreciate. All of them gave a part of themselves and their lives to do what they thought was right. All of them deserve the recognition and the thanks of their fellow citizens for what they gave.

It is not only fitting that we should set aside a day to honor their service and their contribution. It is imperative that we do so. It is not something that we are giving to the Vietnam veterans—it is something we owe to them.

I commend those who have taken this initiative to denote May 7 as Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day.

But, far more importantly, I want to salute the memories of all of our Vietnam service men and women—those who are fallen, those whose fate is still unknown and those who have returned to resume their lives here at home. Let us remember and honor each of them on May 7 and, indeed, every time we reflect on the duties and privileges of being an American.

As the distinguished minority leader indicated, it will designate May 7 as Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I rise to join my distinguished colleague, ROBERT BYRD, in the resolution he has introduced and which I have cosponsored, which provides that May 7, 1985, be designated "Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day."

At the time, I want to again congratulate Senator BYRD on being honored by the Paralyzed Veterans of America earlier this week, and for the presentation of a portrait painted by Veterans' Administration artist, Tom Neilsen.

At that ceremony, many of Senator BYRD's colleagues commended him for his service to America's veterans—all our veterans, not just those from the Vietnam era, or World War II, Korea or World War I. And I join with my colleagues in echoing those praises for Senator BYRD.

Mr. President, the resolution before us reflects the highest values we place on all veterans. But it is specially designed to honor the unique service of the Vietnam veteran.

We must recognize and appreciate the unique nature of the Vietnam war, and we must continue to address the special needs of its veterans in light of the times during which the conflict occurred.

Mr. President, we must also recognize and appreciate that the vast majority of Vietnam veterans have shown a remarkable ability to overcome physical, psychological, and economic hardships; they are among the most productive members of our society and they have achieved educational and salary levels higher than many of their nonveteran peers.

As to their feelings for America, you will not find a more patriotic and freedom-loving citizen than the Vietnam veteran. As any of our Nation's veterans will attest, only by fighting for freedom can one truly appreciate the consequences of its loss.

The 10 years since our disengagement from Southeast Asia have been a bittersweet time for America. But I believe it has been one in which all Americans have seen, once again, that despite the public criticisms and a heated national debate over our involvement in that conflict, the men and women of our Armed Forces who were sent to try to secure freedom in distant lands stuck to their end of the bargain and upheld the finest traditions of the American military.

Vietnam veterans are deserving of high praise and recognition, just as their colleagues-in-arms have deserved such praise and recognition throughout our great history. Let us show them that although our Nation was divided regarding military involvement in Vietnam, we, as a nation, are truly grateful for their contributions, given selflessly and often with the ultimate sacrifice. The resolution is meant to pay a formal tribute to the patriotic efforts made on our behalf by our Vietnam veterans.

For those efforts we will be forever grateful, and that gratitude, in some measure, is what the good Senator's resolution is all about. So I support this resolution and urge my colleagues to join with us in making May 7 a formal day of recognition for the Vietnam veteran.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President. I am most pleased to lend my support to Senate Joint Resolution 128, to designate May 7, 1985, as "Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day". May 7, 1985, will mark the 10th anniversary of the ending of the Vietnam war. With this anniversary has come much reflection and examination of America's role in Vietnam and the sacrifices made by American fighting men and women who served in the Vietnam theater. More than 57,000 Americans made the ultimate sacrifice for their country during that war. Another 2,400 Americans are still listed as missing in action in Southeast Asia.

It is very right and our duty that the country should pause on May 7, 1985, and remember with feelings of compassion and pride the men and women who fought in Vietnam. It is right and good that the Senate should support Senate Joint Resolution 128, designating "Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day" and requesting the President to issue a proclamation calling upon all Americans to observe that day.

So then, I commend the efforts of Senators BYRD and CRANSTON in introducing this resolution which I have cosponsored and I join my colleagues in support of this well deserved recognition. Throughout the 10 years since the end of the war, Congress has kept and honored its obligations to the Vietnam veteran through the enactment of significant legislation specifically targeted at assisting those soldiers. It is only fitting that we should take this time for a moment of pause in our daily activities both here in Congress and throughout the Nation to pay tribute to the Vietnam veteran.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota, a Vietnam veteran, would like to say a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am happy to join as a cosponsor of this resolution. I commend its sponsors. Let me say that I have taken a particular interest in Vietnam veterans since having served in Vietnam as a lieutenant many years ago. Only recently, I joined with some other Vietnam veterans in this Chamber in sponsoring legislation regarding the mental health and physical health of Vietnam veterans. This legislation would improve our Veterans' Administration hospitals, particularly for our Vietnam veterans still suffering from posttraumatic stress disorder.

We have also joined in offering legislation regarding special training for Vietnam veterans who have not gotten into the job market—both vocational-technical training as well as higher education.

We have also urged that the VA take special account of the fact that the Vietnam war was a different kind of war in terms of veterans, and that many Vietnam veterans have suffered feelings of guilt or feelings of stress, and have not fit into the regular job market as veterans of other wars who were welcomed home. The attitude in the country has changed substantially. I recall when I first returned from Vietnam that very few people would wear their uniforms on the streets because they were accosted or would run the risk of an insult. That was a rather sad day in our country's history. That has changed fortunately. Vietnam veterans are now being recognized.

I think it is a much healthier atmosphere. But it is indeed appropriate that there should be a "Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day" and I am happy to join as a cosponsor and urge its immediate passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there amendments to the resolution? If there be no amendments, the question is on the engrossment and the third reading of the joint resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOLE. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 47

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will now state the amendment to the preamble..

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] for himself and Mr. DOLE, proposes an amendment numbered 47.

On page 2, in the 1st Clause, after the word suffer, strike "physically and psychologically"

On page 2, in the 4th Clause, strike, "and respond appropriately to the needs of"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the preamble.

The amendment to the preamble (No. 47) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 128), with its preamble, as amended, is as follows:

S.J. RES. 128

Whereas over three million American fighting men and women who served in the Vietnam theater for over a decade acquitted themselves in the highest traditions of American service personnel;

Whereas more than fifty-seven thousand Americans lost their lives there, and an additional two thousand four hundred Americans are still listed as missing in action in Southeast Asia;

Whereas thousands of Vietnam veterans still suffer from the effects of the war, including many who are permanently disabled;

Whereas regardless of the ultimate verdict of history about United States involvement in that war, the service that patriotic Americans performed in the Vietnam theater is deserving of continued and reemphasized grateful recognization;

Whereas the Nation is now beginning to review in a more dispassionate and even-handed manner the history of our involvement in the Vietnam conflict;

Whereas for too long the Nation failed to honor the service of Vietnam veterans and was instead anxious to place the Vietnam experience behind it; and

Whereas May 7, 1985, marks the tenth anniversary of the official end of America's involvement in the conflict in Vietnam: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That May 7, 1985, is designed "Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such a day with appropriate activities.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank again the distinguished majority leader for calling up this resolution, and also for his chief cosponsorship. In addition to Mr. DOLE and myself, the following Senators are cosponsors of the legislation:

Mr. MELCHER, Mr. DODD, Mr. CHILES, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. WARNER, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. NICHOLS, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. BOREN, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. MATTINGLY, and Mr. METZENBAUM.

I thank all of those who have joined in cosponsoring this measure.

Again, I thank the majority leader for providing that other cosponsors may, during the day, add their names.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I also would like, if there is no objection by the minority leader, to ask unanimous consent that Members may have the right to submit statements throughout the day to the resolution.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for morning business has expired.

FIRST BUDGET RESOLUTION FOR FISCAL YEAR 1986

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the pending legislation.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 and revising the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal year 1985.

The Senate resumed consideration of the concurrent resolution.

Pending:

Dole (for Grassley and Hatfield) Amendment No. 46 (to Amendment No. 43, as amended), to limit the growth in Fiscal Year 1986 budget authority for defense to an inflation adjustment.

Mr. GOLDWATER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, what is the situation relative to time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator controlling the time in opposition has 27 minutes. The proponents of the amendment have 13 minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator from Arizona yield for just a question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Well, all right.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I only want to ask the Senator from Arizona whether he intends to use the remainder of the time until 12 o'clock. I have no objection, but I just want guidance.

Mr. GOLDWATER. No, I shall not use 27 minutes, but I cannot tell him how many minutes I will use.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator from Arizona and I apologize for the interruption.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate may proceed.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I believe it is time once again to remind my colleagues of the hard facts concerning the security of our Nation. It has become obvious over the past few weeks that many of my colleagues have conveniently forgotten that there is a growing threat to our national security. I want to ensure that the Senate is fully aware of the impact of further reductions in the defense budget.

I might remind my colleagues, if they will look at their Constitution, that the first responsibility of Members of Congress is to provide for the defense of their country. It is not to provide for food stamps, social security, retirement, COLA, or anything else; it is to defend their country and defend this country's freedom.

Mr. President, for a brief period in the early 1980's, Americans shook the shortsighted notions of the 1970's. But now, as the price of defending our interests and holding to our cherished principles has become the focus of popular attention, too many Americans in positions of leadership want to return to the policies of weakness, conciliation, and isolationism.

Mr. President, I recognize that in Washington, DC, and in other parts of our Nation, there are many organizations that are opposed to our strong defense and offense position. This is their right. I watched, for example, on channel 26 last Sunday night a complete program against the structure, the ability, and so forth, of our Armed Forces. All I am asking my colleagues is that when they are supplied information on our Armed Forces, they realize the source and whether they are willing to stand behind the veracity of the statements that they will receive.

Mr. President, the threat that we face is real, is ominous, and it is growing. The Soviet Union has not frozen its defense efforts over the last 4 years; it has moved ahead rapidly in all categories. Over the past 10 years, the Soviet Union has fielded an additional seven divisions and has outproduced us in virtually all ground force weapons systems. The Soviets have produced tactical aircraft at twice the rate of U.S. production and have increased their fleet of nuclear attack submarines by 50 percent.

Mr. President, I might remind my colleagues that we have not, in almost 20 years, purchased enough tactical aircraft to meet the normal attrition of accidents that occur within those forces.

Over the same period, talking now of the Soviets again, they have quadrupled their arsenal of ICBM warheads and deployed more than 420 intermediate range nuclear missiles.

Mr. President, I have to comment here that if there is one thing the Soviets worry about in relation to the United States it is our mastery of technology. I want to say at the same time that the technology of the Soviet Union has increased rapidly. The equipment that they are putting into use today is far, far better from a technological standpoint than they were a few years ago; nevertheless, we retain that leadership. As long as we do, that respect from the Soviet Union will exist. In fact, I think it is one of the reasons that the Soviets agreed to come back to the bargaining table in Geneva—that plus the fact that we have probably the strongest conventional forces in the world regardless of size.

There are no reliable indicators that the Soviet arms buildup is abating and there is no logic in assuming that the Soviet military budget would be frozen if we froze the U.S. defense budget. As President Reagan has said, we are not free to size our defense efforts simply in terms of our domestic economy. We must respond to requirements that are outside of our control.

Let me remind my colleagues also that when I speak of the Soviet Union, I speak of them only as one potential enemy of our freedom.

We are committed, Mr. President, to military action with no treaty. For example, we have promised the country of Israel that, if they are attacked, we will come to their defense. Now, that is a matter of honor. It is a promise that I think we would have to honor. So we are not only talking about the possibility of having to engage in combat with the Soviet Union. We have another country coming up that we have, unfortunately, blessed by our recognition, Red China—just to mention a few of the places that we did not have as possible enemies or sites of conflict a few years ago.

Four years ago the Congress and the American people endorsed a defense recovery program which would help our Nation recover from the neglect of the 1970's, but the Congress has reneged on that endorsement and made significant reductions in the President's defense budget plan.

Since March 1981, when the President submitted a 5-year defense budget in response to the mandate provided by the American people in November 1980, the Congress has cut almost $100 billion from the defense budget. The President's budget request for 1986 is almost $60 billion less than what he proposed in his original 5-year plan for this coming fiscal year.

Now, the President has agreed to reduce his defense request for 1986 by an additional $10 billion, resulting in a total cut from the March 1981 plan of $165 billion. And still some of my colleagues in the Congress want to cut more.

It has become sort of a fetish with my colleagues in the Congress that the only place we can achieve any hope of reducing our deficit is through the defense budget. Let me remind my friends that we could eliminate the defense budget and it would not solve our deficit problems. We are not in trouble because we have been spending money on defense. It might contribute to it a bit. Our trouble stems from the almost unlimited number of welfare programs Congress has enacted in the last 50 years. It is contributed to by the inability of Social Security to support itself, by the inability of almost every Government retirement plan, civil service, railroad retirement, veterans, and now my colleagues say, "Well, we will take it out of the hide of our Armed Forces."

Many of my colleagues argue that the defense budget has grown at the expense of domestic programs. I will tell you unequivocally that this statement is untrue. The Congress has cut the defense budget request to varying degrees in 8 of the past 10 years while adding to the domestic budget in 6 of those 10 years, and on the whole the size of the increases in the nondefense area have far exceeded the cuts in defense. This demonstrates to me that the major share of responsibility for rising deficits must rightfully be pinned on growing domestic programs rather than defense, contrary to the assertions of some of my colleagues.

Now, Mr. President, several of my colleagues will propose amendments to the budget resolution which would accomplish similar levels of deficit reduction either by raising taxes or by cutting defense but not by significantly reducing spending for politically popular domestic programs. But what share of the deficit reduction burden must defense bear? According to OMB, the defense budget represents approximately 26 percent of Federal outlays in 1985. Under the Senate-administration compromise plan, defense provides over 36 percent of the total deficit reductions in 1986, and 33 percent of total reductions over the 3 years.

Mr. President, Senator GRASSLEY's proposal, which I in part am addressing, would cut an additional $5 billion from 1986, making the defense share in that year over 44 percent of the total reductions. Over 3 years, the Grassley amendment would take 43 percent of total deficit reductions from the defense function.

Now, I believe that the Senate-administration compromise represents more than a fair share of reductions from the defense budget and that Senator GRASSLEY's proposal goes too far.

I ask my colleagues who want more cuts in defense, from where would these cuts come?

I mentioned yesterday on the floor that I have been in this community almost every day since last November's election. I have been begging my colleagues to tell me where they want defense cut. I think the first statement I made was, "Yes, we can reduce defense spending. Where do you want to cut it?" I have not had one single proposal of where we might cut this defense budget.

The Armed Services Committee, which I chair, has reported a national defense authorization bill for 1986 which represents approximately 3 percent real growth in defense over 1985. Now, we took a shot at marking that bill to a level allowing no real growth, and a bipartisan majority of the committee would not endorse that level of reduction. I ask, therefore, that those who advocate greater reduction tell me precisely where they would take those cuts.

I have a hunch that there will be 50, 60, or 70 amendments offered on this floor in the next several days pointing a finger at precise places where my colleagues feel there can be further cuts.

It is not enough, however, to say cut this weapon system or that one in order to achieve the major outlay savings required by a budget freeze. It is not that simple. Looking at the outlay distribution for the 1986 defense budget, one finds the following: 42.9 percent will be devoted to pay and related expenditures; 7 percent will go for operating expenses; 38.3 percent will be spent to fund prior year commitments, and only 11.9 percent represents discretionary investment for 1986. This means that unless we are willing to sharply curtail operations, significantly reduce pay or cancel existing contracts, the brunt of cuts must be absorbed in the discretionary investment area. And Congress has shown over the past 4 years that we will not substantially reduce pay for military personnel and defense civilians or make significant cuts in the operation and readiness area.

Now, Mr. President, in that respect I would like to warn my colleagues against entertaining the idea of introducing amendments that have anything to do with retirement or anything affecting the military. I will be the first to recognize that the whole retirement structure needs going over. I will tell you at this time that Senator NUNN and I and other members of the Armed Services Committee have been working on a very, very thorough, heavily detailed document that will outline the real problems that we face in the Pentagon in the command structure. This is the first time it has been attempted since the 1920's.

I further remind my colleagues that the Constitution charges us with raising the Army and the Navy and retaining control over them.

So I do not want to see amendments offered to tamper with personnel, because at the present time we have the best personnel we have ever had in the armed services in my long, long association with them.

I do not want to see at this time a beginning of a loss of great interest, as shown in our ability to fill our ranks, not just with young men and young women, but young men and young women of high school level, which is something we have never accomplished before.

My colleague from Iowa offered an amendment yesterday to cut the defense function in the budget resolution by more than $17 billion in outlays for 3 years. In explaining his reasons for offering this amendment, my colleague cited the familiar theme of waste, fraud, and abuse in Pentagon procurement practices.

Senator DOMENICI correctly made the point the other day that we can all complain about inefficiencies in defense procurement practices. But when the Pentagon is involved in almost 15 million transactions and awards, over $146 billion in contracts annually, cutting the defense budget is not going to eliminate these inefficiencies.

I want to take my hat off to my friend from Iowa for the great work he and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH] and others have been doing in this general area of calling the attention of the American people to obvious examples of waste, such as $5 nuts and bolts, $200 wrenches, and so forth. But when you are engaged in 15 million transactions a year, it is pretty difficult to figure out how we are going to eliminate these things.

However, if we study the bill we have introduced from the Armed Services Committee, we find an amendment that lists every bad piece of business that Senator GRASSLEY and Senator ROTH have pointed out. The bill lists them and prohibits them and provides not just minor penalties but very severe penalties—jail and money. Even though most of these would probably be allowed by the Internal Revenue Service, we do not propose to allow them in the general conduct of the business of purchasing equipment.

I might also make a comment relative to the Navy, and the Navy is merely an example. Through Secretary Lehman, there has been established a competitive group. I spoke with this group several months ago. Every one of them has at least the rank of captain, many the rank of commodore. Their job is to go around the country and try to chisel, try to get the cost of equipment down. Have they done any good? They did enough good last year to refurbish the U.S.S. Missouri and build two frigates, without any additional cost to the taxpayer.

The other services, I can report, are now engaged in similar exercises. I think that those facts, along with the work that Secretary Weinburger has been doing in this field, will have an immediately demonstrable effect.

I should like to make my colleagues aware of a few of the instances in which the Department of Defense has discovered and combatted waste and inefficiency in the procurement process.

Critics charge that the weapons costs are growing out of control. The Congressional Budget Office reports, however, that the annual rate of cost growth for major defense systems has declined from 14 percent in fiscal 1980 to less than 1 percent in 1984.

For example, the cost of the C-5B transport plane dropped by 10 percent in the last year. The Army's UH-60 Blackhawk helicopter costs 9.5-percent less than last year. The CG-47 Aegis class cruiser costs 8-percent less than last year. Reductions in weapons costs indicate a major improvement in the procurement process—contrary to the allegations of my colleagues.

I might comment on another piece of equipment. The AH-64 attack helicopter has dropped in price from $16.5 million to under $10 million.

The major achievement of the Department of Defense is increased competition for procurement contracts. Since fiscal year 1980, the number of yearly competitive contracts has increased by 37 percent, to over 6 million contractors. During fiscal year 1984 alone, the Department of Defense competitive awards increased to more than $53 billion, or 43 percent of all procurement dollars. Only 28 percent of contract awards were not competitive.

Internal audits in the Department of Defense uncovered most of the so-called horror stories relating to spare parts procurement. For example, while the Pentagon did buy a diode for $110, they received a refund for that single overcharge and in the same year purchased more than 120,000 of the same piece for only 4 cents each. The Pentagon did buy a hammer for $435, but subsequently received a refund of the overcharges and purchased over 87,000 hammers for $6 to $8 each. DOD never bought the $9,600 allen wrench because the purchase was stopped when the excessive charge was discovered.

Critics charge that the Pentagon allows excessive contractors charges and ignores fraudulent practices. But the facts show that DOD will recover over $200 million from two manufacturers who billed the Pentagon for improper charges from 1978 to 1983. The Pentagon has suspended payments to contractors who make false claims. DOD investigative services opened over 48,000 fraud and larceny charges over the past 3 years, referring over 20,000 for prosecution or administrative action and winning over 1,500 convictions. Over 1,000 unscrupulous defense contractors have been suspended or debarred from doing business with DOD since 1981.

My colleague was probably unaware of these facts, and I am happy to enlighten him.

Mr. President, our budget problems are very real, and we must address them responsibly and with dispatch; but our deficit problems cannot be remedied at the expense of national security.

I have to say that freezing the defense budget has quite a bit of sex appeal the first time you hear it. A freeze of everything across the board would make every committee's job practically nonexistent. It would be a lot easier than what we go through today. When we look at the defense budget and realize what we are talking about, freezing is going to result in only one thing—ultimately, much higher cost for each item we freeze.

For example, in this year's military budget there is only one new item. It is a $40-million contract to buy communications equipment so that the Army will have better access to the entire area they are defending, and it will allow them at this time to have better communications with the Air Force.

That is the only item that we have in this year's budget that is not new.

Where does the rest of the money go? It goes to pay for things that we have not only bought but for things which are now in our inventory. For example, the F-15 aircraft, the F-14, the F-16, the F-81, the B-1B, the M-1 tank, the Bradley Battlewagon, so on and so on.

These are moneys that we owe and if the United States all of a sudden says to these manufacturers across this country "We are not going to pay you this year," I do not think it take much imagination to realize what is going to happen when we start paying contractors again and start placing orders again as we should be. Freezing would be a giant step backward after 4 years of success in restoring our military posture and regaining the confidence of our allies.

We must make the difficult and politically unpopular decisions which are necessary to make responsible reductions in both defense and domestic spending, and I urge my colleagues to continue to support the Senate-administration compromise.

In closing, Mr. President, I have spent almost every year of my adult life close to the military. I have to say that I speak with some prejudice when I speak in favor of the military. I have never known the military strength of the United States to be as well off as it is today. I hear a lot of so-called academic experts, I have read a lot of books, pooh-poohing this idea, but I go out in the field, Mr. President, I travel around this world, and I talk to the men in uniform. I do not talk to the officers. I talk to the enlisted men. That is where you get the real truth.

Never have we had as well prepared Armed Forces as we have today not only from the standpoint of equipment, although we do not have enough of it, but from the standpoint of individual proficiency in the use of this equipment and individual respect, discipline, and loyalty to the cause.

So, when we begin looking at places we might cut this budget, let us think about that. Let us think about our country. Let us stop trying to think a way we can get reelected, and that seems to be the only exercise we have been going through on this floor. How many votes can I cast that will get me reelected. Getting reelected is not the important thing. Protecting our freedom, defending our rights, and the rights of the American citizen is our first prerogative, and I urge you do not forget it.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON). The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, how much time remains on the amendment and how much time on the resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Remaining time on the amendment is 15 minutes under the control of the majority leader.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield myself such time as I may need on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I think that the amendment being considered at this moment is probably as important as any amendment we will consider.

I think that the Senator from Iowa, whom I commend for having offered this amendment, stated it so well when he said yesterday that we have created a new group of welfare queens, defense contractors.

The Senator from Iowa is right. The five largest defense contractors in this country received $620 million in Federal tax refunds even though they did not pay a penny of Federal income tax on their profits of $10.5 billion over a period of 3 years, 1981 to 1983.

Defense contractors are the ones who participate in the ads telling us we ought to balance the budget, but not at their expense.

Boeing made $1.5 billion and received $267 million in refunds. General Dynamics made $931 million and received $71 million in refunds. Grumman Corp. $474 million; no taxes paid. And Lockheed $1.08 billion in profits; no taxes paid.

And let us not forget General Electirc which earned $6.5 billion in profits from 1981 to 1983, paid no taxes, and received refund checks totalling $283 million.

Of course, some major defense contractors did pay taxes but at very, very low rates. Martin Marietta Co. paid 1.5 percent; Rockwell International, 3.1 percent; and TRW 6.7 percent.

My distinguished colleague, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said, how are we going to balance the budget, what are we going to do? Well, I think that one of the things we could do in order to balance the budget is to see to it that every corporation in this country that makes profits bears a fair share of that tax burden.

I think that we ought to understand full well that the proposal of the Senator from Iowa is not to cut defense spending. I think if I stood here for the next 20 minutes and repeated myself over and over again, it might still be difficult to get the media to explain to the American people that there is not a Senator in this body who has come forward with a proposal to cut defense spending. Some argue that we cut defense spending when we spend less than some figure the President has set as the amount needed for defense spending. But even the Budget Committee proposal provided for an inflation allowance, which is not the same way that every other program in this country was treated. And this proposal is for 3 percent in excess of inflation.

In other words, the Senator from Iowa is trying to eliminate that 3 percent above inflation. He is not attempting to eliminate the inflation increase. He is just saying, "Look, enough is enough."

What he is saying and what all of us are saying who support this amendment is that in considering a budget you have to look at the priorities, you have to be fair, and you have to see what you get for your money; and there has been so much waste and fraud and abuse in the Department of Defense that it is embarrassing.

The man who heads that department had a reputation in his younger years as being Cap the Knife, and many of us thought that when he came into office in the Department of Defense that we would really see a tough-minded approach being brought to the whole issue of defense spending. And as a matter of fact, there is not that much secret about it, that the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee and I some years ago wrote an eight-page letter to the Secretary of Defense indicating how there might be some economies and efficiencies in the Department of Defense.

Nor is it a secret that he and I joined together trying to force the Department of Defense to utilize competitive bidding in the purchase of a plane called the CTX. The CTX purchase is not the most major item in the Defense Department expenditures, but it is indicative of the determination of the Department of Defense not to use competitive bidding unless forced to do so.

I remember when Mr. Carlucci was the Deputy Secretary of Defense, and an able one was he. I remember when Senators ARMSTRONG and WARNER and I met with Mr. Carlucci and Cap Weinberger to talk about our concerns about wasteful Department of Defense spending, and he indicated then, and I have no reason to doubt his commitment, that indeed the Department of Defense was going to move into this area and we indicated our concern at that point that the failure to use competitive bidding by the Department of Defense in something like 90 percent of the dollars spent for procurement was wasteful and inefficient.

No local township trustee or city official or county official or State official could get by with the same failure to use competitive bidding.

This issue of competitive bidding is not a new one for the Senator from Ohio. I have stood on the floor of the Senate when there was a Member of my own party, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and I have fought and proposed amendments to require competitive bidding. And I have seen the acceptance of those amendments on the floor of the Senate only to see them disappear in the conference committee.

No matter how you slice it, there remain serious problems with competitive bidding and other businesslike practices in the Department of Defense. Everyone talks about it as being a wish and a hope.

But the situation with respect to Mr. Carlucci was an interesting one because, after we had had the meeting with him and after we had urged upon him the utilization of competitive bidding, we found Mr. Carlucci issued 31 new initiatives by the Department of Defense. And by some strange reason that I still have never had explained to me, there was one initiative that was not included and that was the requirement to use competitive bidding.

And so when we raised the issue with him again, there was a 32d change that was made, and competitive bidding was included, but it was alleged there was an oversight at that point.

One thing we know. Everybody wants to balance the budget. Not one Member of the U.S. Senate says that we should not have a balanced budget. And everybody in America writes letters, or some do, but all those who do urge this Congress to balance the budget. Often, when I get a letter from somebody of that kind I usually point out to him or her the fact that he or she may also be supporting at the very same point some part of the budget, some part of our tax laws, some part of our expenditures that would really not help us to balance the budget.

Everybody wants to balance the budget provided that somebody else pays the tab. And so what we are thinking about with the Grassley amendment is a strong move in the direction of balancing the budget by agreeing to give the Department of Defense an increase in their spending commensurate with the amount of inflation for the period but nothing more.

What we are talking about is whether or not we are going to spend for a single MX missile the same amount of money that could be used to eliminate poverty in 100,000 female-headed families for a year.

As a matter of fact, for the cost of one nuclear attack carrier, we could pay for all the foster care needed in the United States for the next decade. That would be about 100,000 foster care arrangements per month for 10 years.

For the cost of a single M-1 tank, we could send 5,311 children to remedial reading classes for 1 year. And would we not have a better America if we did that instead of buying the tanks and some of the equipment that is presently being purchased that does not even work, such as the Divad?

In 1980, defense was 23 percent of Federal outlays. It will reach 30 percent by the end of fiscal year 1986. In fiscal year 1980, we spent $144 billion in defense; by fiscal year 1985 we will be spending $293 billion, more than a 100-percent increase over 1980. And by 1990, we will be spending $488 billion, about 3½ times, as a matter of fact, the amount that we were spending in 1980. We have doubled the defense budget in 5 fiscal years and we will nearly double it again by 1990 if we proceed along the present path.

Over the next 5 years, the President wants $2 trillion for defense. Now what is $2 trillion? Two trillion dollars is so much money, it is such a big number, that hardly any human being can conceive of what $2 trillion is. But I think everybody ought to understand what it is. I think those who work here ought be understand what it is. I think everybody in the media ought to understand what it is.

The simplest way that I can explain to them what $2 trillion for defense is over the next 5 years is to say that every single household in this country will have to pick up the tab to the extent of $25,000—$25,000 for every single household in America. That is what a $2 trillion defense budget means to America.

Secretary Weinberger's credibility has become an issue in this whole matter of defense spending. Now the Secretary, who I respect and who I think is a decent human being, frankly speaking, has a credibility problem. And that credibility problem is not just in the Senate. It is with the American people.

Cap Weinberger in 1981, said this:

> We can do this because the American people are prepared, for the first time in two decades, to make major increases in resources available for defense.

Cap Weinberger was right. And I do not question what he said in 1981. Because in 1980, 71 percent of all Americans, according to the Harris survey, wanted defense increases. But 4 years, and $1 trillion later, the American people are saying: "Stop. Enough is enough." But the Secretary of Defense, unfortunately, and Ronald Reagan, unfortunately, are not listening.

The Harris Poll in January of this year has support for increased defense spending not at 71 percent, not at 61 percent, not at 40 percent, not at 20 percent, but at 9 percent of the American people, according to the January Harris Poll. That is the lowest that it has been in 14 years. Yet the Department of Defense comes to the Senate with a $2 trillion defense budget—that is the 5-year projection—$25,000 for every household in America. So I say that the Secretary has a big credibility problem.

He says it is the Russian threat, their superiority, that dictates the budget increase. By a 57 to 37 percent majority, Americans reject that claim, accordiing to the Harris survey.

The Secretary says he has brought cost overruns under control. But, Mr. President, by an 84 to 11 percent majority, the American people do not agree with him.

The Secretary says he has come to grips with waste, fraud, and abuse in the Department of Defense. But by 89 to 8 percent majority—89 to 8—the American people believe there is still too much waste in defense spending.

The Secretary says we need every single weapons system in the budget, but by a 74 to 19 percent majority the American people say that the military keeps coming up with too many systems that just will not work.

And then the Secretary says that the Defense Department does not contribute to the deficit in a major way, and the President adopts that line of reasoning. And he say that budgets for other programs are largely irrelevant to the defense budget.

But those of us in the Senate know differently. We know that budgets are about choices. The Secretary and the President would say there is no connection. The American people do not agree with that. They know that there are choices, tough choices, to be made. They are not making them the way the President and the Secretary would have us believe. According to the Harris survey, by 77 to 15 percent, or 5 to 1, an overwhelming majority would cut defense spending before cutting Medicare benefits, and by a 74 to 20 percent majority they would cut defense spending before cutting Federal aid to education.

Another substantial 71 to 21 percent majority would cut defense spending before making any further cuts in Federal health and nutrition programs. By 57 to 32 percent, a clear majority would prefer to seek cuts in defense spending before cuts in Federal farm price supports.

Of course, we do not run Government by polls, and I know that I have belabored the point with respect to the Harris survey. But I think those who would come to the Senate and say that the American people want to spend more and more on defense are not reflecting the will of the American people. I think those who would say that in order to balance the budget we have to gut social programs while increasing defense by $23 billion are not reflecting the will of the American people.

I do not think I ever received as many comments and reactions as I did on a recent trip to Ohio from people who indicated their concern—about how they were going to send their children to college; about whether they were going to have a larger tax burden or be unable to run their local communities by reason of cutbacks in general revenue funds.

The American people are scared. They are afraid of what the President of the United States and we here in the Congress are doing to them. The American people still believe in a strong defense, but they no longer believe that $1 billion a day defense budget is a guarantee. They want the Department of Defense to live within this Nation's means. They also want to cut the deficit. They want restraint and shared sacrifice. You can no longer pass off a $23 billion increase next year as being a tough cut on the Department of Defense. Quit kidding the American people. The American people know that an increase is not a cut. We ought not try to convince them that increasing defense spending is indeed a cut from some mythical figure that the President of the United States and some Members of the majority party arrived at in the Rose Garden sometime ago.

I say to you that I believe that the challenge before us is one that we can accept. We can meet our responsibility by bringing an element of fairness, and an element of equity to this budget. In order to do that, we must determine what kind of defense spending we should have as compared to what kind of spending we should have for domestic programs in this country.

A very famous President, a very famous Commander in Chief made this statement on the question of national priorities. On April 16, 1953, Dwight Eisenhower said the following:

> Every gun that is made, every warship launched, every rocket fired signifies . . . a theft from those who hunger and are not fed, those who are cold and are not clothed. This world in arms is not spending money alone. It is spending the sweat of its labors, the genius of its scientists, the hope of its children.

Now is the time to heed the eloquent advice of our former Commander in Chief, our former President.

Mr. DOMENICI. Parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. How much time remains in opposition to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All of the time in opposition has expired.

Mr. DOMENICI. How much time remains for those who support the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirteen minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I understand the distinguished Senator from Indiana desires to speak in opposition to the amendment. Senator, we have about 11 hours on the resolution. I think the other side has about 16. I yield such time as you might need off the resolution. Do you need 10 minutes? I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Indiana off the resolution.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee for yielding time.

Mr. President, I serve on the Budget Committee and also the Senate Armed Services Committee, and have spent a lot of time on looking at the defense budget, and trying to figure out what we ought to be spending, and what kind of needs we have in the area of national security. Having served on those two committees, I have had the privilege of listening to a lot of reasons that we ought to cut defense spending, and quite frankly a lot of reasons to cut defense spending have been rather irrational. We somehow come up with: If we cut Social Security, we must cut defense. If we cut nondefense here, he have to cut defense there, forgetting the fact that defense spending is judged on the threat and the allocation of resouces to meet that threat.

Now we have just heard somewhat of a reason to cut defense spending: Defense corporations do not pay any taxes. I might also state that is one that is really one of the more irrelevant matters as to how much money we should be spending on national defense. That argument on whether defense corporations or any other corporations ought to be paying taxes ought to take place in the tax simplification proposal that the administration will be suggesting. But that does not disabuse anyone nor does it change the tenor of the debate on defense spending because I think the whole debate has been many times very irrelevant to the fundamental point, that is, what should our allocations of defense spending be to meet the Soviet threat?

I have the deepest personal affection for the Senator from Iowa. He and I had the privilege of serving together in the House of Representatives. We were elected in that class, or infamous class, of 1980 that we will be hearing one heck of a lot about in these next few months. We have enjoyed a very good personal relationship over the years. But having said that, we do have violent policy differences on how we ought to approach the area of national security.

I know that he will take my remarks in the policy area and not as a personal matter. But I really believe, Mr. President, that in fact in this budget debate we are simply picking numbers out of the air. We have one day a 3-percent real growth defense budget, next day we have 4-percent real growth defense budget, and now we have a zero-percent real growth budget. There also was a proposal to freeze military spending at the nominal level we approved last year. That would mean we would have a negative 4-percent real growth in defense spending. In the Budget Committee the Senator from Iowa had positioned that he was for a zero, and absolute zero growth: minus 4 percent. Now we are on the floor and the amendment before us is a zero growth but to allow for inflation. And so we have had a change of opinion of the Senator from Iowa from the Budget Committee to the floor that I think has moved in the right direction. Maybe if we had this debate a few months later on we might get the Senator from Iowa and others to move from that zero percent to 3 percent. I do not know. I do not know what factors went into the change of opinion of the Senator from the Budget Committee to the floor but I certainly welcome it. I welcome those who have moved from supporting zero growth, which is a minus 4 percent, to have a nominal increase of 3 or 4 percent. It is heading in the right direction. I am hopeful, though, quite hopeful, that this amendment will be defeated.

Mr. President, what we are doing here is playing bingo. We are calling off numbers, numbers that nobody knows what meaning they have except those in the Armed Services Committee, who have diligently, under the leadership of Chairman GOLDWATER and ranking member Senator NUNN, gone through and analyzed back to where we can make reductions and cuts in the area of national defense. But, no, right now, it is a bingo game out here. You know, zero percent—that is a zero-percent increase, not zero minus 3 or 4 percent. You can just get up and call off numbers and make a speech and that is it.

Let me tell you, Mr. President, I do not think we ought to be playing bingo with national security. This is a very, very important issue. This is an issue of vital concern to this country. Certainly, defense spending is going to take its licks like everybody else. We have cut defense spending. We have cut defense spending from the rose garden over the 3-year period of time, with the 3-3-3, about $125 billion over the next 3 years—a $125 billion cut. The Senate Armed Services Committee, to get down to the 3-percent real increase, cut out $19 billion in 1 fiscal year; $19 billion of cuts in 1 year, $125 billion over 3 years. That is, in fact, a serious cut in defense.

Believe me, Mr. President, I understand the politics of the situation so well. I understand that it is in fact politically popular to say, well, we are just going to cut defense. Well, we have cut defense. The question is now, do we want to cut defense even more? We had a very, very good discussion of this situation in the Senate Armed Services Committee. It was a bipartisan vote. We took hours and hours of testimony. We reported it out overwhelmingly at 3 percent and here we are on the verge of saying, well, we have come down and cut the President's increase in half; now, that is not good enough and we really need to cut it down even further.

I suggest that if we, in fact, do that, we are really getting into the high-risk area, and I hope that the Senate will follow the lead of the Armed Services Committee on a bipartisan basis and not the lead of just a number that happens to be plucked out of the air and put into the budget resolution, and say this is what we ought to be spending on national defense.

Mr. President, one of the things that we all look for is some degree of stability and some feeling that when the Government of the United States says something, there is a reasonable degree of assurance that they are going to live up to that commitment.

The commitment that the United States has made with our allies in the past few years is that we are in fact going to increase defense spending because of the neglect we had in the decade of the 1970's and the fact that we do not want to return to being a nation that lacks respect, that lacks credibility, that is viewed by the world as impotent. That decision was made by the people of the United States in 1980 and was reaffirmed in 1984, that if given the choice and the risk, we believe we ought to decide on the side of being too strong. But if you give the American people or give somebody else a choice, particularly our allies, in the question, would you rather have an America too strong or would you rather have an America too weak, they will say, we will risk on the side that we would rather have an America too strong rather than an America too weak.

Mr. President, last year, on the floor of the Senate, by a vote of 76 to 16 on June 7, we adopted an amendment that confirmed and said, it is the sense of the Congress "that the President should insist that the pertinent member nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization meet or exceed their pledges for an annual increase in defense spending during fiscal year 1984 and 1985 of at least 3-percent real growth." We said of our allies that we expect them to have a 3-percent real growth. We have a lot of alliance bashing. We say, "Oh, come on, NATO, do your share; come on, Japan, you are not doing your bit."

We had Senators stand up and they said, "It is a paltry 1.2 percent to 1.7 percent average real growth rate for our European allies. We and our allies can afford a mutual defense. As a matter of fact, we cannot afford not to defend ourselves."

Again, this Senator reaffirms that NATO ought to have a 3-percent real increase in defense. By asking NATO and our other allies to have a 3-percent real increase in defense implies that the United States will do equally well.

I can say one thing, Mr. President. We are now down to 3 percent and if, in fact, we go below that, but even as we are now at that level, there will not be too many NATO amendments this year. As a matter of fact, I would not be at all surprised if perhaps in the Bundestag or the British Parliament, they might introduce resolutions over there saying, "United States, you ought to live up to your commitment. You said we ought to spend up to 3 percent; why don't you?"

Mr. President, where does that put us as a nation, that we are as a matter of fact not going to live up to that commitment we have made, that commitment that we have made as a nation, the commitment we made as a Congress just a year ago? And all of a sudden, because of some other reason, we decide just to pull the plug on a steady projection of increasing defense spending by 3 percent over the next 3 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Indiana has expired.

Mr. QUAYLE. May I have 5 more minutes?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 5 additional minutes off the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana may proceed.

Mr. QUAYLE. I thank the Chair.

I would like to read a couple of other statements that were made by Senators during the debate that stated our commitment of 3 percent. Senators said, "We are asking the Europeans just to live up to what we do." Last year, we asked them to live up to a 3-percent commitment. Now what are we going to tell them? Live up to a zero-percent commitment? I mean, come on, we have to have some degree of harmony, some degree of consistency.

Another Senator said, "I submit that if this alliance is not strong enough so that we can have a team which operates as a team and meets its commitments as a team, then we are going to be weakened."

I would say that we, in fact, will be severely weakened if, in fact, we adopt this amendment.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. QUAYLE. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. COHEN. As I recall, and perhaps he will refresh my recollection, last year, there was a major amendment debated in this body as to whether or not, if the Europeans did not measure up and do more, we were going to start withdrawing our troops. It seemed to me that sent shock waves through not only this country's military establishment, but the Europeans'. And they are still bruised by that particular amendment.

I happen to have agreed with the goal of the Senator who offered the amendment, but not necessarily the method used. Here we are, less than 1 year later, talking about doing far less. It seems to me the Senator makes a very valid point that it is difficult to argue to the Europeans that they have not measured up, and we are going to pull troops out if they do not shape up or ship out, as I recall the phrase used last year. Here we are, maybe 8 or 9 months later, calling for doing exactly the same thing the Europeans were doing a year ago.

Mr. QUAYLE. The Senator is absolutely correct. And the Senator, who was a very pivotal person in that debate, knows full well the parameters of that debate. That debate, as he said, was either shape up or ship out. I believe that is what it was.

I think the point the Senator makes and perhaps one good thing would come out of this, is that at least this body is not going to get any NATO amendments this year. I think it would be difficult for the Senate to stand up and say, "NATO, you live up to your commitment." What is that commitment? That commitment, if we adopt the Grassley amendment, would be zero.

I agree with the Senator from Maine, who is an expert in this particular arena, that perhaps some of our legislators across the ocean might be introducing amendments to ask the United States to live up to their commitment.

It would be sort of the reverse NATO amendment.

Last year we adopted a sense-of-the-Senate resolution that we ought to spend 3 percent at least. I remember on the campaign trail last year, former Vice President Walter Mondale's defense budget was the NATO budget of a 3-percent increase. Now we are seeing the possibility that we are not going to have 3 percent, that we are going to go down to zero growth.

Mr. President, I also want to discuss the issue of fairness and that somehow defense is not paying its fair share of the budget deficit reduction package.

The budget deficit reduction package now with Social Security added back into it, if this amendment would pass, would make defense spending cuts about 43 percent of the total budget deficit reduction package. Defense spending is only 26 percent of the budget.

If you want to play with numbers and statistics, I can produce statistics showing that you are going to be making an inordinate amount of cuts in defense spending, and I do not believe we want to do that. I do not think it is fair.

Looking at the issue of national security, I do not think that is the right thing to do. But fairness is a very important argument that has in fact been waged over these past months.

Now, Mr. President, I want to refute a couple statements that have been made by my friend from Iowa. He has stated that competition is somehow alien to the Defense Department. I can tell you that competition is becoming much more the rule rather than the exception. Consider that tactical missiles—the Sidewinder, Sparrow, Maverick, and Hellfire—are being produced by two competing manufacturers. Second sources are also planned for the Phoenix and AMRAAM, and the committee has directed the Army to evaluate a second source for the TOW missile.

As chairman of the acquisition subcommittee, I can also assure the Senator that competition and how we get more for the dollar in the Department of Defense is something about which I am vitally concerned, and the committee is also concerned. I know the chairman of the Armed Services Committee has said that this subcommittee is perhaps one of the most important subcommittees of the Senate Armed Services Committee, because we are going to get a better procurement system, we are going to get more competition. I know the Senator from Maine has an intense interest in this area. We have more competition. Competition is in fact saving money.

Competition by dual sourcing, once you award a contract and get another contractor involved, sometimes takes up-front money, but it is going to save money in the long run. If in fact we go down to zero growth, I can assure you competition is going to take two steps backward, because one of the vital things that we put in the defense bill that is going to come to this floor is encouraging more dual sourcing.

I asked the question of all the services when they were before the committee: "In the cases where you have had dual sourcing, does it cost you less in the long run or more?" Each and every time they said, "It costs less."

I can tell the Senator that what he is trying to achieve—more competition and less cost—will not happen; his amendment will be counterproductive, and we will be having a debate on why unit costs are coming up, why we are not having dual sourcing and why we are not getting efficiency in the Department of Defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 5 minutes have expired.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I ask for 2 more minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield the Senator an additional 2 minutes.

Mr. QUAYLE. The reason why, Mr. President, simply would be that with a budget squeeze we could not afford to have some of the dual sourcing that I would like to see and some of the dual sourcing that in fact the Senator from Iowa says he would like to see.

The Senator also says that the unit costs are supposed to decline as production rates increase, but he claims this has not been the case. Again, I have to take strong exception.

Two years ago the administration proposed to buy six EA-6B electronic aircraft for the Navy at a cost of $66.6 million each. In this year's budget, by increasing that production rate to 12 aircraft per year, the unit cost is reduced to $38.9 million each, a reduction of over $27 million per aircraft.

There are other examples, Mr. President. I ask unanimous consent that other items where in fact we have lower unit costs be make a part of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Two years ago when we bought only 230 HARM missiles, they cost over $800,000 each. This year, by procuring 1,715 missiles, that price is reduced to $278,000 each.

Two years ago, when we bought 112 AH-64 attack helicopters for the Army, each helicopter cost $11.9 million. This year by increasing the production rate to 144 aircraft, that price is reduced to $8.8 million per aircraft.

Mr. QUAYLE. Finally, Mr. President, now is not the time to cut defense, for the reasons I outlined, and many more that others will state. We have made a reasoned approach on a bipartisan basis of 3 percent. We have reduced defense. Defense is a part of the deficit reduction package. But we have other considerations. In fact, the national security interests of our country are at issue. If others cannot look to the United States for leadership, for respect, for commitment, for resolve, stability and determination, then I do not know to what country they can look. National security is in fact the No. 1 priority of any nation. It is the No. 1 priority of this Nation. We should take it seriously. The Senate Armed Services Committee has taken that effort seriously. It has produced a bipartisan resolution and I hope that the entire Senate will accept that proposal rather than the proposal offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, did the distinguished occupant of the chair desire to speak in opposition to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does and would be grateful for relief.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished junior Senator from California to speak in opposition. While he is taking his chair as a Senator, let me yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. President, I am having difficulty understanding just what the rationale is for cutting defense. I have not yet heard what I perceive to be a valid reason for anyone to cut defense. I understand some think that, if we cut deep enough, we may reduce the cost overruns, the so-called cost growth, of major weapons systems.

Well, we do not have to dramatically cut defense to see that happen. We have already seen it happen dramactically: In 1981, that overage was 14 percent; in 1982, it was 12 percent; in 1983, it was 3 percent; and in 1984 it was 1 percent.

I really do not know how one could expect much better performance. If you want to save money by getting rid of weapons systems you can do that but that would put America in the position where our deterrent strength invites those who do not like what we stand for, to involve us around the world and ultimately make us weak enough where we will risk a war. But I will have some more to say about the other view that maybe by cutting defense, we will automatically stop all of the waste. I will give some analysis of why that will not work and how we are already making some dramatic improvements in that area at a later time. Now I yield to the distinguished junior Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. QUAYLE). The Senator from California is recognized.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Chair and the distinguished manager.

Mr. President, 3 years ago when our Nation began to face the awesome threat of a crippling Federal deficit, one of our own, a Senator of unusual courage and compassion, a Senator taken tragically and all too early from us, cautioned his colleagues against the temptation to solve our domestic fiscal crisis by savaging our Nation's defense. Mr. President, the Senator I refer to is Scoop Jackson. I quote him today and bid my colleagues heed his wisdom now as we did then. Senator Jackson said:

> Mr. Chairman, I would hope that this would be a time of steadiness, a time to go about our work in a manner and in a way which will demonstrate to the world that we can provide a very strong and steady hand in a very unsteady world. I think that is the challenge that we all face because the world looks to this country with only seven percent of its population and the world expects at times bigger things than we are capable of providing, but above all else I think we need to provide a steadiness, not only in reality, but in appearance that will give confidence to others.

Mr. President, Congress must neither retreat nor shirk its responsibility to deal with these cancerous deficits despite the difficult and painful nature of that task. Reducing the deficit is one of the most painstaking processes. The issue remains in doubt, and nothing should escape our scrutiny, and nothing has.

Defense has already made a most significant contribution. But we must recognize, as our colleague Scoop Jackson recognized in that speech on this floor a few brief years ago, that unlike other portions of the Federal budget that are purely internal matters, the defense budget of the United States not only protects the safety, freedom, and security of our own citizens, but also, that of millions of people around the world who depend upon our assurances and upon our strength. We have not made these assurances, these commitments, lightly. The Senate of the United States has been required by the Constitution to ratify the treaties that our defense spending honors, and we should not and cannot take lightly the consequences of those treaty obligations.

The defense budget, Mr. President, represents the tangible manifestation of our commitments to our allies—commitments, Mr. President, that without resources lose credibility. Heeding Senator Jackson's caution, we have embarked on a steady course to insure defense resources commensurate with our commitments. The American people have overwhelmingly endorsed this course. They have rejected the imprudence of "defense on the cheap," and have reaffirmed the inextricable link between ourselves and our allies.

In 1979, our Nation and our NATO allies, in recognition of an ominous and growing threat, pledged to each other to provide at least 3-percent real growth of our individual defense resources, to deploy almost 500 intermediate range nuclear weapons in Europe and to unilaterally dismantle over 1,000 nuclear weapons in the NATO arsenal. These historic agreements, Mr. President, proved to be watersheds in alliance relations and have led the way for the solidarity we enjoy today. There are many Senators, Mr. President, who, while applauding our allies for their fortitude with respect to these intermediate range nuclear force deployments, have chided our allies, have goaded our allies, and—as I have heard personally from many senior alliance defense ministers—have publicly rebuked our allies for falling short in meeting the agreement on 3-percent real growth in defense expenditures.

It has been argued on this very floor, Mr. President, that Americans must ask why it is that we should bear the burden for Europe's defense when the Europeans will not even spend their fair share. Many allies have claimed that domestic fiscal crises have made meeting the resource commitments of 1979 excruciatingly painful, and politically very difficult. This Senate, Mr. President, last year came within a few votes of withholding our resources for the defense of Europe pending NATO compliance with the 1979 accord on 3-percent real growth in defense spending, despite the economic crises faced by our European allies.

Yet, Mr. President, our allies have cinched up their belts. They have courageously taken the political heat. Many have sacrificed their political bases, and this year they have met the 3-percent real growth target.

Can you imagine what now—after their meeting their goals by such painful efforts—a reduction in U.S. defense expenditures this year below the 3-percent real growth that we insisted upon, will do to our credibility with those allies? Can you imagine the impact on the morale and solidarity of the NATO alliance? What other inference can our allies worldwide draw from such an action? They will infer, Mr. President, that U.S. commitment to our allies is more rhetorical than real, and no more lasting than a passing political fashion, full of sound and fury but signifying little in the long run as our limited national attention is diverted by some new domestic pressure. Mr. President, this inconstancy does not serve us or our allies well. It undermines both our real and symbolic strength and thus our value as an ally. As this amendment would shrink and demean America's part as leader of the free world, so would it immeasurably weaken the whole of free world alliances.

Mr. President, because of the constraints of time, I will leave it to my distinguished colleagues who have informed the Senate already as to the direct impact on readiness, military capability and quality of life for our service men and women that such reductions necessarily involve. I will leave to them the direct and indirect economic impact of these cuts on employment, on the jobs of millions of Americans who proudly serve this Nation by insuring that democracy's arsenal is and will always be the finest we are capable of providing.

Yes, this amendment threatens both the security of our Nation and the jobs of honest, patriotic working men and women, steelworkers, engineers, machinists, scientists, iron workers, and tradesmen who unfortunately and inevitably bear the financial and psychological burden of attacks on the integrity of our defense industry. We cannot justify defense spending as a stimulus to employment. Neither can we ignore the fact that our national security interest coincides with our national interest in providing needed jobs to millions of defense workers.

Of course there must be continued efforts, as the distinguished Senator from Indiana has said, in terms of reforming procurement.

But Mr. President, there is no line item in the defense budget for waste, fraud, and abuse. If there were such a line, we would all gladly reduce it to zero. But it is not that simple. Procurement reform is vitally needed, as the Senator from Indiana has pointed out, but meat axe cuts to the defense budget will not achieve reform. It will impede reform. A vote for this measure is not and must not be thought to be a vote for procurement reform.

In fact, Mr. President, cuts of the type contemplated in this amendment may well serve to aggravate and prolong procurement abuses by excising funds that would otherwise be used to pay the upfront costs of increased competition which challenge comfortable sole source procurements.

Nor is a vote for this amendment a vote for fairness. Defense has taken its fair share of the burden of defense reduction. We have already whittled almost $60 billion from the original defense request for fiscal year 1986. Further cuts can represent only a shortsighted, punitive action against legitimate and necessary defense spending.

Procurement, even were the excesses of the process accurately portrayed by media reports, is not the bulk of the defense budget, nor even close to it.

What will inevitably be the consequence of these reductions, Mr. President, is the kind of incremental erosion of U.S. military capabilities that we saw in the seventies. And this erosion, Mr. President, will inevitably impact on our commitments to our allies. There are many in the Chamber today who can recall all too vividly the consequences of this erosion. They remember when President Carter sought to withdraw U.S. troops from Korea because, he said, his defense budget did not match our commitments.

Who among us, Mr. President, will tell us which of our commitments we can fail to honor, or what costs such failure will carry? Which ally we can turn our back on? From which free people we can withhold our shield? And how long, Mr. President, will we be able to claim the leadership of the free world? Or even claim the trust and loyalty of our allies? If America is seen as faltering in our resolve, if we are seen as an unreliable ally, our alliances will exist on paper but not in fact.

Mr. President, I would urge my colleagues to reject this amendment as I suggest our colleague, Scoop Jackson, would have urged us. Let us show the kind of steadiness that he counseled, the kind of leadership the world expects of us. Let us again meet the challenge of freedom as Americans have done for generations. Let us do so with clear will and purpose, knowing that the cost of this defense spending will avoid an infinitely greater and more precious cost in lives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I yield myself 7 minutes from the amendment. If I need more time, I will ask to take it from the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY] yield for a brief colloquy on his amendment?

Mr. GRASSLEY. I am happy to yield to my distinguished friend from South Dakota.

Mr. PRESSLER. As a cosponsor of the amendment of the senior Senator from Iowa, I would like to briefly explore the effects of the amendment.

As I understand it, this amendment would hold the increase in fiscal year 1986 defense spending to an inflation increase, and would allow a 3-percent increase above inflation during each of the next 2 fiscal years. Is that a fair interpretation?

Mr. GRASSLEY. The Senator from South Dakota is correct.

Mr. PRESSLER. In other words, for fiscal year 1986, both Social Security cost-of-living adjustments and the national defense budget function would receive the same treatment? Both would be held harmless for inflation?

Mr. GRASSLEY. The Senator is correct. Both receive an inflation adjustment for the coming year.

Mr. PRESSLER. May I ask the Senator how much of an increase would occur in defense spending under his amendment? And how does that amount compare to the cost of the full Social Security COLA for which we both voted yesterday?

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, this amendment would restore the total deficit-reduction package to $52 billion. It would save the $3.2 billion lost yesterday in Social Security.

Mr. PRESSLER. I appreciate the Senator's remarks. They are indeed reassuring.

At this point, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a brief statement on the Social Security COLA vote yesterday.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SOCIAL SECURITY COLA

I recently conducted a poll in my home state to determine what South Dakotans consider to be the most serious problem facing the nation. By an overwhelming margin, the budget deficit was selected as the number one problem. I have supported and fought for a balanced federal budget ever since coming to Congress. I support much of what is accomplished by the Administration/leadership compromise budget package. It does make some meaningful cuts in the huge deficit. However, I could not support the proposed reduction in Social Security cost-of-living allowances for several reasons.

The Social Security Act Amendments of 1983 created significant reform in the Social Security system. These difficult changes were made in order to ensure the continued solvency of the system. Many were not popular. However, they were necessary. One major reform resulting from these Amendments was the removal of the Social Security program from the unified budget beginning in FY 1993.

Although currently Social Security payroll taxes are counted as revenues and benefits are counted as outlays under the unified budget, the Social Security account is separate from other budget functions. Social Security is not a discretionary spending program. It is financed completely by its own tax. Any revenue savings achieved through a COLA reduction cannot, by law, be used for any other purpose than Social Security. This fact should be recognized by every member of Congress in these deliberations.

This means that any deficit reduction Congress claims to accomplish through reduction of Social Security COLAs is a false savings. Because these savings cannot be applied against the budget deficit it is unfair to tell the citizens we represent that a reduction of Social Security COLAs will result in a reduction of deficits. This is simply untrue. More importantly, this line of logic paints a false picture of the true nature of the deficit problem. Because these savings cannot be used to reduce the deficit, to include them in the total deficit reduction figure is truly misleading.

Reduction in Social Security COLAs will have a severe impact on a very vulnerable constituency—the elderly and handicapped living on fixed incomes. The Congressional Buget Office tells us that the COLA changes contained in the compromise budget would have caused 650,000 Americans to fall below the poverty level over the next three years. Most of these would have been the elderly who worked all their lives to help build this country. They have contributed part of their hard-earned income to the Social Security system. Are we to show our gratitude by forcing them into poverty in the name of false deficit reduction? I say, "No."

It is important to reduce the budget deficit, but it must be done truthfully, meaningfully, and fairly. Americans are willing to accept their fair share of the burden of deficit reduction. How can we ask those we represent to accept cuts and freezes in virtually every domestic program and then not apply all these savings to the deficit issue? To ask for these cuts and then allow a huge increase for defense spending is simply not fair. This amendment would place defense on an equal footing with Social Security. In fact, by removing the three percent real growth increase in defense spending, we will—unlike with Social Security COLA reductions—achieve actual, additional reduction in the federal deficit. For fairness' sake, I supported the restoration of Social Security COLAs. For fairness' sake, I will support this reduction in defense spending.

DEFENSE EXPENDITURES

Mr. PRESSLER. In addition Mr. President, as chairman of the European Affairs Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee, I have long been concerned about the failure of our European allies to contribute their fair share to our mutual defense burden. We spend close to 60 percent of our defense expenditures in defense of Europe, and I have argued that this is unfair to American taxpayers. Why should they spend more of their tax dollars on European defense than the Europeans spend on their own defense. I am glad we have a strong alliance, but we need a better balance in defense contributions. U.S. forces are spread thinly throughout the world. We cannot do the job alone, and we need more help from our wealthy allies in NATO and Japan.

As the Senator from Iowa knows, the NATO Allies agreed in 1979 to commit themselves to spend annually on defense an amount that is 3 percent in excess of inflation. Over the entire period since 1979, the United States has consistently exceeded that pledge, while the European NATO partners collectively have fallen below the 3 percent real growth standard.

In view of these facts, would the Senator care to comment on whether his amendment would be consistent with our NATO commitments?

Mr. GRASSLEY. Over the last 4 years, the defense budget has grown from $211 billion in fiscal year 1982 to $292 billion in fiscal year 1985, a 39-percent growth rate in current dollars and 22 percent in constant dollars. This growth is unprecedented in the post World War II era. The last four appropriations exceeded, in constant dollars, the four most costly years of the Korean and Vietnam wars. More import, the cumulative effect of a hypothetical 4-year freeze at today's levels would exceed the cumulative expenditures of the last 4 years by 10 percent in constant dollars.

In short, the defense budget would be frozen at a very high level. This would be more than enough, by any measure, to meet our NATO commitment.

Since 1978, when we reached a common understanding with our NATO Allies to increase defense expenditures or outlays at a rate of 3 percent annually, we have exceeded that commitment every year. That surplus now stands at nearly $117 billion. In fact, had we held to that 3-percent spending commitment, defense outlays would have been approximately $40 billion lower in fiscal year 1985. Even if we freeze defense budget authority for 3 years, outlays will grow at 3 percent—exactly our NATO commitment.

Mr. PRESSLER. I thank the Senator, and commend him for his vigorous leadership to reform our defense modernization effort of the past several years, but I certainly agree with him that we cannot write blank checks for the Pentagon.

I certainly agree with you that the United States has overfulfilled its pledge. The Senator has made a strong case, both on the grounds of equity and fairness, as well as greater efficiency in managing our defense resources, for this amendment.

Mr. President, I commend the Senator for this amendment to allow an inflation increase for defense during the next fiscal year, the same treatment we have accorded Social Security. His amendment also provides for a real growth increase for defense in fiscal years 1987 and 1988. The overall package which we approved on Tuesday is not unravelled by yesterday's vote for a full Social Security COLA. I am pleased to be a cosponsor of Senator GRASSLEY's amendment, which saves enough money to cover the full COLA without destroying the overall savings in the leadership-White House compromise budget package.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I compliment Senator PRESSLER not only for this amendment, but also for his help over the last 3 years in our efforts to have an across-the-board budget freeze which would affect defense as well.

I would also wish at this point to add that it is necessary for me to repeat a portion of my statement from yesterday, and a point I just raised with Mr. PRESSLER, because I think it speaks to many of the questions that the Senator from Indiana raised and also a lot of consideration that has to be given to just where are we as far as the level of defense expenditure is concerned, and what we can do within that level.

Yesterday I said:

> Over the last 4 years, the defense budget has grown from $211 billion in fiscal year 1982 to $292 billion in fiscal year 1985, a 39 percent growth rate in current dollars and 22 percent in constant dollars. This growth is unprecedented in the post WW2 era. The last four appropriations exceeded, in constant dollars, the four most costly years of the Korean and Vietnam wars. More important, the cummulative effect of a hypothetical 4-year freeze at today's levels would exceed the cummulative expenditures of the last 4 years by 10 percent in constant dollars.
> In short, the defense budget would be frozen at a very high level.

That is a quote from my statement of yesterday.

I would like to say that in my judgement this would be more than enough by any measure to meet our NATO commitments.

Since 1978, when we reached a common understanding with our NATO allies to increase defense expenditures or outlays at a rate of 3 percent annually, we have exceeded that commitment every year. That surplus now stands at nearly $117 billion. That is money we have got in the bank. In fact, had we held to that 3 percent spending commitment and not exceeded it, defense outlays would have been approximately $40 billion lower in fiscal year 1985.

The evidence shows DOD can get tough and it can squeeze out excess costs and overhead. I referred to a study yesterday and I have another study here. The study I have here shows 7 percent factory efficiency and 420 percent scrap-and-rework. I would like to know if we should ignore this evidence. Now, there is no effort on my part to say that the workers in our defense industry are unproductive or unpatriotic. In fact, I would say they are probably some of the most patriotic and could be much more productive if the system in which they worked would look internally and not through the subsidization that we have provided the industry, and be able to ignore the great inefficiency there. Our people will produce according to the system they are in, but we need some changes for greater efficiencies within our defense industry.

Mr. President, the entire Nation—our constituents—are focusing today on this vote to freeze the defense budget.

They are wondering what our response will be. They are wondering how their elected officials will repond to the horror stories they have read about in their hometown newspapers.

They are expecting us to correct what they perceive as a very serious problem. And serious, indeed, it is.

Will we reward the payment of $750 for a pair of pliers? Or $7,000 for a coffeepot? Or charging taxpayers to board Fursten-the-Dog?

Will we reward on a larger score of 33 percent factory inefficiency? Or 41 percent scrap-and-rework?

And will we reward a Defense Department which was given 75 percent more in constant dollars over the past 4 years than the 4 years under President Carter for tactical fighters and bought 11 percent fewer planes?

These abuses have occurred for no other reason, Mr. President, than because there is just too much money available for defense.

Why else would pliers cost $750? It's because that is what the market will bear—that is what we in Congress are willing to provide.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON). The Senator's 7 minutes have expired.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I yield myself 5 minutes off the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is not entitled to do that.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Could I have 5 minutes off the resolution?

Mr. DOMENICI. I will be glad to do that. I understood that the Senator managing the floor on the other side wanted to yield the Senator 5 minutes.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Will the Senator in control from the other side yield?

Mr. PELL. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Now our constituents across the country are standing by right this minute. They are waiting. They are waiting to see how we are going to respond to this problem.

The worst action we can take as a representative body is to ignore the problem and to dash their expectations. And what a terrific signal that would send.

But I am confident, Mr. President, that this body will send a very strong message to our people that we will take this very important first step toward gaining control of a bureaucracy, an industry, and, yes, even a Congress, which have encouraged these abuses.

It is time for us to use that simple two-letter word which, alone, is powerful enough to correct this serious problem. That two-letter word is: "No."

I have heard my distinguished colleagues who oppose this amendment, yet they have failed to refute the input/output analysis I presented yesterday on the floor: That unprecedented budget growth in defense has not bought more tanks, planes, and ships, but rather what has it brought? It has brought exhorbitant costs and overhead.

Indeed, no one can refute this analysis because it is made with DOD's own data.

Let no one doubt my interest in a strong defense for this country or my support of the President in what he has done in this world to restore credibility to our Nation's defense posture. However, that defense base cannot remain strong if our industrial base erodes or if we spend money unwisely on defense equipment which will neither provide the right quantity nor quality of weaponry to defend this country and the lives of our fighting sons and daughters.

This country has over the years been extremely good to business. It is now time for our defense industry to return that kindness to this great country of ours and our fighting men and women.

Let me say, too, that I have a great deal of respect for the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. I happen to have had so much respect for him, and I still do, that in 1964 I was the Butler County chairman for the "Goldwater for President" campaign. I first heard him speak in Iowa City 4 years before that, and I was a supporter of his since that early day.

I think in a very real sense that I am doing what the Senator from Arizona said before Christmas when he was quoted in U.S. News & World Report. He said "I expect to be chairman of the Armed Services Committee next year." Of course, he has become that.

I am going to make my final 2 years in the Congress an effort to get the cost of weaponry down. I would favor freezing military spending at last year's level.

And he had this to say about the manufacturers. He said:

The average manufacturer in this field knows that he has had a gravy train ever since World War II. I just have a strong gut feeling that we can cut military contracts, maybe not a lot, but we can head manufacturers' prices for weapons the other way or we can't buy them.

That set a tone before Christmas when I figured that we would really be able to make a great change in the way the Defense Department does business.

I have been working on this for 3 years. I think we have a real opportunity to make a difference right now, to send a signal, to send that very same signal I think my friend and colleague from Arizona was trying to send before Christmas in 1984.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator allow me a couple of minutes?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator quoted me correctly. I am not one who stays hitched to an idea when I find out it is no good. And I found out that the freezing would be disastrous.

But I would like to ask my friend from Iowa one question that has plagued me. During all the 3 years of research, how much is the total amount that you have come to on screwdrivers, toilet seats, et cetera, et cetera? Are we talking about a couple of billion dollars?

We have already cut $10 billion out of the defense budget. You want to cut another $9 billion out. And I know of amendments coming up that will result in a $40 billion cut.

I would like to have the total figure of all the bad buys that we made. I think it would be a great addition to our knowledge. I do not think it is great. I do not like it any more than my friend from Iowa likes it. But at the same time I am wondering just how much it amounts to.

Over the past 20 years, 1966 to 1985, the total Federal budget has grown in real dollars from $456.8 billion to $928.9 billion. Defense spending accounted for 11 percent of that increase, while domestic spending and net interest payments accounted for the other 89 percent. In comparing just domestic and defense expenditures during that period, the growth in domestic spending outpaced defense and increased by a ratio of 7 to 1.

And I might add that the Armed Services Committee has already knocked that figure way down.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am going to yield shortly to the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

I yield myself 3 minutes.

I heard my good friend from Arizona talk about the overall budget, and I recall that the distinguished Senator from Ohio quoted President Eisenhower.

Well, let me tell you that the United States of America has done precisely what Dwight Eisenhower recommended. Since he left office in 1960, we have increased education spending for the needy 2,300 percent, medical spending, 2,700 percent.

We have had no real growth in defense for an entire decade; one whole decade, no real growth. We saw social spending at the same time grow 1,400 percent.

Now, this year, my best estimate is that for nutrition type programs and programs that help the poor children, since somebody addressed that, we are spending $91 billion this year, for needy children in America.

We had the implication that we ought to cancel the B-1 bomber so that we could spend some money for the needy. The welfare of the needy is a good goal, but so is the defense of our country. It is not that one is good and one is not, that one is necessary and the other is not. They are both things that we have to do. We have not, in the last 15 to 20 years neglected the needy in this country so that we could build the defense of our country.

I mean there are some who would put defense in a higher priority—I might—but we have increased spending for both. And to stand up here and ignore what we have done and say, "if you just do not build some battleship you could feed some children," is a repudiation of the way we make public policy.

If you do not like Amtrak,—that is $800 million a year—that could be put to use for the needy. If you do not like Job Corps, which helps a little tiny group, that could be used to put more in a lunch program. I hope nobody believes that any of this is a solid reason for cutting defense.

I just cannot understand how we are here and nobody is talking about what we need for defense. I mean, we have been here talking for 2 days and all I am hearing is that we are spending too much for toilet seats. Well, we have already cut defense over the last 4 years by hundreds of billions of dollars. We are prosecuting more people for cheating and fraud than ever in history. We brought down cost overruns from 14 percent to 1 percent, in 4 years.

Why are we not talking about what our free Nation needs to maintain the peace? It seems to me that peace is as admirable a goal as any other goal we have got. Sooner or later we have got to come down to the Senate floor and discuss what we need for defense, not what our thoughts are about how we will make the Defense Department more responsive if we squeeze them far enough. It seems to me that we are neglecting the very basic thing we should be talking about.

If there is somebody who can come down and say we ought to take $30 billion or $40 billion out of defense because they know we do not need something, that makes a good argument. Or if you can really convince anybody that the Defense Department that has to execute 52,000 procurement actions a day—and that is what I understand the number is, why would anyone think that a reduction of a couple billion dollars is going to catch some more waste.

They are catching waste, they are catching it in bushels. They are prosecuting more offenders than ever in history. So we ought to be talking about continuing all of this and deciding how much money is legitimately needed for defense.

And maybe there is somebody that knows enough about defense that can convince the President of the United States and the U.S. Senate that we do not need 3 percent growth. I have not heard that kind of argument here in the last 12 or 15 hours.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. DENTON. We are facing an issue here, Mr. President, which has been eloquently addressed but not adequately addressed yet because we do not have the time. I want to side with my chairman on the Armed Services Committee, Senator GOLDWATER, and with the bipartisan majority on the Armed Services Committee in opposing a further cut in our defense spending.

I want to summarize some of the major reasons why further cuts to the defense budget, beyond those already made by the administration and the Armed Services Committee, are a bad thing. The amendment before us should, indeed must, be defeated in the interests of our Nation.

First, Mr. President, it is our obligation to provide for the defense and the security of our country. Bipartisanly, we must recall that the Preamble to the Constitution states the purposes to include providing for the common defense and promoting the general welfare. The first is a mandate, the second leaves a lot of maneuvering room. If the Federal Government does not do all that might be done for the general welfare, the States have the power and the resources to act, but the States themselves can do nothing if the Federal Government fails to provide for the common defense.

Second, we face a very real current and growing threat to our security and freedoms, and to those of our allies. What is required to provide for the defense of our country must be determined by the threat that we face, not by other considerations. Had we learned that lesson in, say, the 1930's, World War II might not have been fought and certainly would have been less costly in blood and treasure.

Third, national defense is not simply another Government program like food stamps or agricultural subsidies or loans for education. If we are not secure, then whether or not we provide those other programs is a meaningless question.

Fourth, the argument that our spending on national defense has increased unreasonably is simply not true. I call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that, in 1962, when John F. Kennedy was President, expenditures on national defense amounted to 45.9 percent of the budget and expenditures on human resources amounted to 28.8 percent of the budget. In that calculation, human resources included the functions for education, training, employment, social services, health, income security, and veterans benefits and services.

Under the so-called Senate-administration compromise, however, the compromise that we narrowly approved on Tuesday, spending on national defense amounts to only 28.5 percent of projected outlays, and expenditures on human resources amount to 48.9 percent of outlays.

In other words, the pattern of expenditures has more than reversed itself in only 24 years. In fiscal year 1986, we would, under the compromise, spend almost exactly the same percentage of the budget on defense as we expended on social services in 1962, while we would spend a greater proportion of the budget on social services in 1986 than we spent on defense in 1962. I think that we have to bring ourselves up short or the Nation is going to be in peril.

Let me point out, in addition, that human resources spending does not include functions for general science, space and technology, energy, natural resources and environment, agriculture, commerce and housing credit, transportation, or community and regional development, many of which would be considered generally as social programs.

I would be happy to show my colleagues the figures, and explain how I calculated the numbers for fiscal year 1986, which I did myself because I did not get much assistance from the General Accounting Office in updating its charts from its 1983 study on defense and the national budget.

Let me also point out that, as a fraction of the gross national product, defense expenditures now are lower than they were in any year of the Kennedy or Eisenhower administrations. Even as recently as 1969, the last year that we had a balanced budget, defense consumed 9 percent of GNP as compared with about 6.6 percent in fiscal year 1985.

I hope that my colleagues will recognize that the budget problem we face today does not come from unrestrained expenditures on national defense but, rather, from a massive increase in our spending on human resources and social programs during the last 24 years. That is not a judgment on the value of that social spending as a whole or on any specific program. It is simply a statement of fact.

Fifth, I doubt that there is anyone in this Chamber, or any informed person anywhere, who would argue that the threats that we face today, to ourselves, to our allies, and to free and independent countries throughout the world, are less serious than they were in 1962. Indeed, I believe that most of us would agree that the threats are more serious, more acute, than they were then. Yet we devote a smaller proportion of our national resources to meeting them.

Let me give my colleagues just one example, which is a Navy example. It is an example that I think, perhaps more forcefully than any other I could use, shows you what has been happening to the balance of power between the Soviet Union and the United States on seas. Keep in mind that the U.S.S.R.'s landpower has no need to defend from the sea. We have to defend from the sea because we are seapower. The Soviet Union had no navy to speak of during World War II.

I want to focus on a measure of the ability to project naval force. That measure is called "ship days out of area," which means the days that ships are deployed out of their home waters, the days that they spend projecting naval power. I have gotten several charts that show what has happened during the past 20 years.

Keep in mind that it takes a lot more naval power to control the seas and permit their use than it does to interdict the seas. Any war at sea will show you how with a handful of submarines the Germans were able to just about permanently interdict the seas against our necessary communication with Europe.

The first chart shows worldwide ship days out of area for the United States and the Soviet Union in 1965, 1972, and 1983. It shows a dramatic change. In 1965, the United States had 17 times more ship days out of area than the Soviet Union, 109,500 to 6,300. By 1972 the Soviet Union had two-thirds as many deployed days as we had, and in 1983 the United States had only 1,000 more deployed days. The trend is clear.

Take a look at a snapshot of 1 year, the turning point 1979. In that year the Soviet Union actually had more ship days out of area than the United States did. That shows what President Reagan has been about, to redress the situation in just one field of military activity, the sea.

So we have come back some but we are not far enough. We are nowhere near the point we need to be in terms of power to control our communications by sea.

If we look at the Mediterranean, the change is even more dramatic. In 1965, the United States had more than four times as many ship days as the Soviet Union did. In 1983, the Soviet Union had 50 percent more deployed days than we did.

The next chart shows the same dramatic change in the Atlantic. In the Pacific, we have gone from more than 50 times as many ship days in 1965 to only 1⅔ as many in 1983.

Finally, in the Indian Ocean, the Soviet Navy had no presence in 1965. Today their presence is nearly as great as our own, and we all know how critical that area has become.

The trends are facts. They are disturbing, sobering, even frightening. They are indications of the degree to which our security has slipped. We cannot for political reasons, for partisan reasons, neglect to look at those facts. The Red Star is now carried by a real blue water navy and it threatens our lifelines and our vital interests.

Sixth, while I am talking about proportions, let us recall that, under the previous administration, that of a President from the other party than mine, we called upon our NATO allies to get them to allocate resources to their defense at a rate of at least 3 percent real growth per year.

Now today what kind of example will we be giving if we cannot do at least that in a time of severe pressure from places we have not experienced before: Central America, Southeast Asia, with Thailand staying alive not because of fear of the United States but because Communist jackals are fighting over the spoils of that which we lost in the Vietnam war. Laos, Cambodia have gone down the drain. Thousands of Vietnamese people drowned in an effort to vote by swimming away from that country, not to mention the number that are enslaved, have been killed, and are being reeducated now.

Mr. President, how can we expect our friends and allies to increase their own contributions to our mutual defense efforts if we are going to decrease our own? Can anyone here fathom the consequences that might ensue from the abandonment among the NATO countries of their efforts to correct a situation of imbalance that we all know was critical and getting worse? After Afghanistan, do my colleagues really want to bet that the Soviet Union will not under any circumstances utilize its own armed forces in a way that directly threatens the free nations of Western Europe? Can they guarantee, for example, that the Soviet Union will keep its hands off Austria, or Finland, or Yugoslavia, none of whom are members of NATO but all of whom exist in independence under the NATO shield?

Seventh, consider the message that a reduction in defense expenditures below the 3-percent level would send to the Soviet Union, particularly in the context of our negotiations underway in Geneva. If the United States unilaterally reduces its defensive strength, then there is little incentive for the Soviet Union to bargain away its own forces and capabilities. The Congress will do it for them. Once again, we are in danger of seeing the real negotiations conducted not with the Soviet Union but within the Congress of the United States.

Eighth, and of particular interest to those of my colleagues who approach this problem as cost accountants rather than as statesmen and strategists, cuts in defense outlays today will produce increased costs tomorrow. As production rates slow, costs are increased. Essential manufacturing capabilities are lost. Skilled labor is dispersed. Slow production rates also increase unit costs, whether for tanks or trucks or aircraft or ships. Contracts already signed must be fulfilled, and in consequence other, more necessary contracts may never be concluded at all.

Whatever the views of my colleagues about battleships, it is worth noting that our country no longer has the capability to build them, because we have no current industrial capability to make the armor plate. Perhaps more to the point, we no longer have the industrial capability to manufacture SR-71 aircraft. Not that we want to build any of them either, but the point does demonstrate that manufacturing capabilities and capacities are lost if they are not sustained.

Ninth, the Armed Services Committee did conclude, in its deliberations, that a real growth of 3 percent in the defense budget is required for our security and to meet our obligations. Our chairman and many Members are generous in the way that they looked at the matter and frequently changed their views, and most of us did when we looked soberly at the consequences of zero growth, which would actually be a reduction because of the situation with contracts and other obligations. And we took a lot more time reaching that conclusion than we will take here on the floor when we are considering the matter as just one part of the budget resolution. Although there was disagreement in the committee, the votes for the 3-percent figure were bipartisan. And I believe that I am correct in saying that every Member who voted against the 3-percent figure had concerns about items that were cut, or that might be cut at a lower rate of real growth. In several cases, they asked to have the money restored, and it was.

We started, the President started, with an increase that was much greater than the 3 percent now in the compromise. That was trimmed, modified, and Rose Gardened down, and then further reduced to 5.9 percent. In the Armed Services Committee, I pledged to fight and die for 4 percent, and here I am arguing to preserve 3 percent. Frankly, I feel a little silly to be in that position, kind of like the butt end of the salami.

Nonetheless, to paraphrase from the song, I've gone about as far as I can go, and my colleagues who share my support for a strong defense have gone about as far as they can go. We've compromised, and then compromised the compromise. Yet we cannot afford to compromise our national security, and it is time to take a stand on that and to be counted, win or lose. We have gone about as far as one can go and still look ourselves in the eye as being worthy of the mandate to provide for the common defense.

Even by going to 3 percent, we have done damage to our national security by reducing funds available for spare parts, for operation and maintenance, for procurement of vital weapons systems, for research and development. It is true that we in the committee did not wield a meat axe and eliminate a bunch of programs. Rather, we tried to do our job conscientiously and effectively, but nonetheless the reduction to 3 percent impairs our national security, not only this year but in years to come. I won't recite the cuts in detail, but they are there, and they hurt.

I don't know who is keeping a tally on votes on final passage, but whoever it is should make a note that this Senator will not vote for a budget resolution that contains anything less than 3 percent real growth for defense.

Tenth, a rapidly growing broad coalition of businesses and organizations, gathered together in the deficit reduction coalition, has strongly supported the so-called Senate-administration compromise, including 3 percent real growth in defense spending. I have talked with their representatives, and I have heard from many of them in writing. There is no question that their concern that we act to control and reduce the deficit is tempered by a recognition that we cannot sacrifice our national security in the process, that we cannot balance the budget on the back of defense.

Moreover, they understand the vital link between our national security policy and our domestic economy. They know that when we lose allies and access to resources, when other nations conclude that we have lost the will to look after our own vital interests, our trade and our economy suffer. The best example of that is the devastating effect of the OPEC oil price increases of 1973 and subsequently upon our domestic economy, increases that would not have taken place so suddenly or in such magnitude had we not demonstrated in Vietnam our unwillingness to persevere in our commitments.

Finally, let us recall that, in both 1980 and 1984, the people of this country voted overwhelmingly for a Presidential candidate who ran openly on a platform of further strengthening our national defenses.

How can we dismiss that as a body? How can we dismiss that in some political orgy, led by the press, that we have to cut everything equitably? There is no connection between providing for the common defense and promoting the general welfare. We must provide what we need.

I believe that the amendment before us is ill-advised and not in the best interests of our country. I wish we were going to deliberate it as long in this body as we did in the Armed Services Committee, but we are not. I regret that.

I urge my colleagues to remember their obligation to ensure our national security, to ignore partisan politics, to bipartisanly back this President just as I would have hoped that we would have backed President Carter in what he wanted to do about stopping the action in Angola. We did not. We did not back our Presidents in trying to continue to send aid to Vietnam when we could have saved that situation after we won the military victory. We are in a similar position today. I ask my colleagues to think about it, to defeat this and any other efforts further to reduce spending on our national defense.

Thank you, Mr. President. Thank you, Senator DOMENICI.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 2:33 P.M.

Mr. DOMENICI. Senators are asking when we are going to vote. Some are coming to the floor in anticipation. As I understand it, Senator THURMOND wants to speak, and I am going to yield him 5 minutes shortly. But I understand that the distinguished majority leader desires that we go in recess immediately thereafter for an hour and time to be charged against neither side.

So everybody will understand, Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator THURMOND, I ask unanimous consent that immediately thereafter the Senate stand in recess for a period of 1 hour, and that the time not be charged against the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment that would reduce defense expenditures for fiscal year 1986 to a level of zero real growth over expenditures for fiscal year 1985. Further cuts in the defense budget are unnecessary and unwise.

Defense spending has already undergone its fair share of budget restraint compared to nondefense spending. Twenty-five years ago, defense spending accounted for 52 percent of the Federal budget. Today, it accounts for little more than 26 percent of the Federal budget—about one-half. During this period when defense spending was declining as a portion of the Federal budget, our security needs did not decline. In fact, they rose substantially. We cannot afford to view our levels of defense spending solely as a budget function; we must take full account of the threat we face and our commitments to our allies.

Mr. President, in the 20-year period from 1964 to 1984, defense spending grew by only 12 percent in real terms while nondefense spending grew by 178 percent in real terms during the same period. The deficit is not a result of excessive growth in defense spending; it is a result of excessive growth in nondefense spending.

While we debate how to further cut defense spending, the Soviets continue to out-produce the United States in nearly all categories of weapons systems. During the last 25 years, our defense posture has declined in all but 6 of 29 major weapons systems categories. The Soviets have been relentless in their production of new equipment and show no signs of slowing. President Reagan summed it up nicely when he stated that we are not free to size our defense effort simply in terms of our domestic economy. We must respond to requirements that are outside of our control.

Mr. President, the compromise adopted by the Senate on April 30 calls for real growth in defense spending of only 3 percent for fiscal year 1986 over 1985. This compromise also calls for defense cuts totaling 36 percent of the deficit reduction for fiscal year 1986. Over a 3-year period, defense cuts will average 33 percent of the deficit reduction. Cuts of this nature, while disproportionate to defense spending's portion of the Federal budget, will afford us the capability to meet our defense requirements. To go below this level is unwise and will be seen as an effort to avoid the tough decisions in cutting nondefense spending.

Mr. President, I strongly urge all of my colleagues to oppose this amendment.

Mr. President, defense does not have constituents. Food stamps have constituents; nearly every domestic program in our budget has constituents. Why is defense so important? Mr. President, I want to say the chief enemy internally of the people today is crime, the criminal. The chief enemy externally is the Soviet Union. They have not abandoned their goal of world aggression. They still have that as their goal. That is to be seen in places like Afghanistan today and down in Nicaragua.

There they have attempted to establish a foothold as they did in Cuba.

We have to keep this country stronger if we are going to keep it free. It is that simple. I hope Members of this body will have the courage and have the wisdom not to cut the defense budget below a 3-percent growth. We need that growth to keep this country free.

RECESS FOR 1 HOUR

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DENTON). In accordance with the previous order, the Senate will recess for 1 hour.

Thereupon, at 1:33 p.m., the Senate recessed until 2:33 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reconvened when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. WARNER).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, how much time remains on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Six minutes.

Mr. DOLE. I am prepared to yield back the 6 minutes. I understand the distinguished Senator from Oregon is on his way to the floor to speak briefly on the amendment. I do not want to deprive him of that opportunity.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that there will be a tabling motion by the chairman of the committee, so there will be a vote very soon.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that there would not be sufficient time remaining to call for a quorum. Under the precedents of the Senate, a Senator making such a request must have at least 10 minutes.

Mr. DOLE. Speaking on the resolution, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, how much time remains on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes remain on the amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes are yielded to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am very pleased to join with my colleague from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY) in offering this amendment. I think the basic question we are really dealing with here today is not so much a question of dollars as it is the more important question, the security of our Nation, the defense of the United States. I believe that any nation that is a debtor nation, carrying a $200 billion budget deficit and a $140 billion trade deficit, is not a secure nation in any sense of the word.

Our future military security is critically dependent upon a healthy economy. I think most of us realize that that was demonstrated very eloquently during World War II, particularly when the industrial productivity of this Nation was capable of being increased and sustained at a level to produce the armaments not only for our own fighting personnel, but for our allies as well. The real distinction in those forces arrayed against each other in World War II, I feel, was ultimately spelled out in industrial capacity and economic strength. There is no one any more concerned than I am on the matter of the security of this Nation. I think the mistaken view is held that any kind of increase in appropriations translates into increased security.

Let me point out to my conservative brethren particularly that this was precisely the thesis acted on by Mr. Roosevelt in the New Deal: the more money you spent on a social problem, the more likely you were to correct it. It did not prove any more accurate in dealing with social problems than it will today on defense.

It does not work that way. In fact, I think this amendment offered by Senator GRASSLEY and myself would achieve a goal that we all want. That is, we build more security for the Nation because we would be working toward a smaller deficit, thereby establishing a stronger productive economy, lower interest rates, and so forth. Second, we would slow down the rate of military spending.

Mr. President, I defy anybody in this Chamber to tell me that we can actually manage and manage well the spending of $1 trillion in the last 4 years for military and the proposed $2 trillion that the administration wants to spend for the next 5 years. All of these $150 wrenches, hammers, and screws, and everything else we read about, are illustrative of our inability to manage the flow of that rate of spending. It is not feasible. 53,000 people in the procurement program of the Pentagon—53,000 people. If we would return it back to the Navy, the Air Force, and the Army to procure, we would probably have a little more ability to control.

Right now, the Secretary of the Navy cannot do anything about it, the Secretary of the Army cannot do anything about it, the Secretary of the Air Force cannot do anything about it. The Secretary of Defense has too much of a pyramid, too many layers of bureaucracy between himself and the departments he is procuring for to get this done well. We get these expenditures—Senator ROTH's toilet seat and all the other examples that are bizarre, that are indicative that when you have such a flow of money, you really cannot manage it. This would slow that down.

Last, this does not in any way impair the procurement of the weapons programs that we are committed to; in fact, recent reports indicate that those weapons would not be affected by this slight reduction.

I want also to indicate, Mr. President, that the Appropriations Committee has had a very interesting experience. If you recall, in the fiscal year 1984 supplemental appropriations last year, the reactivation of the battleship Missouri was accomplished with $336 million in budget savings—budget savings. Shortly thereafter, the Appropriations Committee eliminated over $2.8 billion in excessive cost adjustments, in the fiscal year 1986 operation and maintenance account alone. This year, the MX has been funded with unobligated balances of previously appropriated funds. These large unobligated balances indicate that the flow of money is not being managed properly, and I do not think it can be with the kind of heavy expenditure that is being heaped upon the Pentagon.

Mr. President, we are certainly cognizant of the fact that the Soviet Union has a fundamental part in our whole security planning and our foreign policy. Let me say that this is not the sole factor in making military policy that relates to military spending. In addition, we have to be concerned about feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and housing the homeless. We have to be concerned about those other components of our national security—a good education system, a strong productive economy, good trade relations, and good trade balance, less dependence upon imported energy—all components of our national security. Money alone is not the objective, it is but one course and one means toward achieving security.

Let me close with my favorite statement, made by a five-star general who understood national security better than any President I know, General Eisenhower. He warned the Nation on many fronts, military-industrial problems, and so forth.

He said there may come a time when spending additional money for rockets and bombs in the name of national security, when there are people who hunger and are not fed, who are cold and not clothed, far from strengthening the Nation's security, will actually weaken it.

I ask the Senate to consider that spending for the military program is but one component of our national security; getting this deficit down is as important to our future and our security as any other part of that very complex picture that we call national defense.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment to hold the increase in defense spending to the rate of inflation—the level recommended by the Budget Committee.

I believe that the Congress can fulfill its obligation to provide for the national defense within a budget that is limited to a cost-of-living increase for the Pentagon in budget authority. Even with such a limit, outlays—actual spending—would continue to grow significantly in real terms. After providing for substantial real growth over the last few years, a period of consolidation—particularly in our procurement programs—is warranted. We can continue to provide for real growth in readiness, sustained progress in research and an adequate pay raise within the zero real growth target approved by the Budget Committee.

In our deliberations in the Armed Services Committee we considered what reductions were necessary to achieve zero real growth. An analysis of this effort demonstrates that the required cuts can be made without jeopardizing critical programs. Although this level requires reducing the production rate for some programs and cancelling a few programs of marginal worth, the overall impact is quite modest. In some respects, reductions would actually improve our security, through elimination of wasteful and dangerous programs like the MX ($2 billion) and substantial reductions in others, such as SDI, where the committee has approved a $2 billion increase in funding, to more than twice last year's level of $1.4 billion. For this reason, I offered an amendment in the Armed Service Committee to report the bill at the zero real growth level, as in this amendment.

Many in this debate have argued that the defense budget should not be determined by arbitrarily picking a total funding level. I couldn't agree more. But 3 percent real growth is itself just an arbitrary level. What matters is what we actually receive in national security for our dollar. And I am convinced from our work in the Armed Services Committee that we can have a stronger, and more effective defense with the level of spending proposed by this amendment, if we shape our defense budget wisely.

FOR THE GRASSLEY AMENDMENT

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, amendment No. 48, offered by the distinguished Senator from Iowa is the keystone of this whole debate on the restoration of fiscal solvency for the Federal Government. It would permit us to live within the overall limits of Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 while restoring reasonable levels of funding for programs that many of us feel are essential, but it would do so without compromising our national security.

By freezing Defense Department budget authority to zero growth adjusted only for inflation, the Grassley amendment would provide the same level of funding as proposed by the Senate Budget Committee. But most important, it would realize savings of $10.3 billion from the overall total of the leadership compromise budget in fiscal year 1986. These savings will comfortably cover the $4.4 billion cost of restored Social Security COLA's and conforming adjustments in civil service and veterans' pensions, with enough left over for education, Amtrak, the SBA, and other worthy programs.

I would prefer that the budget authority for the outyears of fiscal 1987 and 1988 be frozen at zero growth as well, or at a lesser rate of increase than the 3 percent allowed by the Grassley amendment, and I believe we will need to address those levels next year to assure continued integrity of the budget.

For the present, it is important to note that the Grassley amendment would do nothing more nor less for the defense budget than we have already done for Social Security, namely, we have adjusted it to allow for the inexorable process of inflation. But in doing so, I am quite satisfied that we would not be compromising national security one iota.

It is worth noting in this regard that the staff of our own Armed Services Committee has found that a freeze in defense spending would not force cancellation of any weapons systems and would in fact allow for significant increases in many of them. A zero growth budget would still allow a 6-percent increase in aircraft purchases, a 44-percent increase in missile purchases, and no decrease in procurement of combatant ships, according to a report of the committee's minority staff.

Moreover, the distinguished Senator from Iowa has presented what I believe is overwhelming evidence that our vast defense outlays not only are failing to produce commensurate results in terms of improved defenses, but that they are being squandered on egregious inefficiencies and outright fraud by defense contractors.

The public, I believe, is fed up and disgusted by the outward evidence of malfeasance by defense contractors—overcharges, fraudulent billings, and high living charged to the Federal Government, not to mention $600 toilet seats and $7,000 coffeemakers. No matter who roots out the problem—and of course the administration is to be congratulated for its efforts in this regard—the point is that all of these problems are symptoms of a system gone amok, the excesses of which must be counted as major contributing factors to our current budgetary dilemma.

In these circumstances, to fund the Department of Defense at anything more than a zero growth level is tantamount to force-feeding a goose. What else are we to assume when we hear that there are some $50 billion in prior budget allocations still in the clogged fiscal pipelines of the Pentagon. The Grassley amendment would slow down the furious pace of defense expenditures and hopefully allow us to get control of the defense budget before it controls us all. I support it and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am supporting the compromise budget resolution calling for 3 percent real growth in defense spending in each of the next 3 fiscal years. I take this position with the caveat that the Senate has a duty to review the national security implications of this reduction in defense spending from what had been estimated in previous budget resolutions.

There is no doubt that defense spending can be cut—but less spending means less capability, and less capability will compel us to reassess our defense and national security commitments and the threats that generate them.

What is the threat? In the last 5 years, the Soviets have nearly doubled the number of strategic warheads targeted at the United States. They have deployed twice the number of new weapon systems introduced by the United States; and their rate of production of tanks, aircraft, and ships is double that of the United States. Furthermore, the Soviet Navy is now a global challenge to the United States. Their Cuban surrogates pave a Marxist-Leninist path into Africa and Central and South America. Soviet military forces and advisers fight in or occupy more foreign territory than at any other time in post-war history.

The U.S. response to this Soviet threat has been a mere $19 billion—in 1972 dollars—increase in defense spending during the so-called 4-year buildup of the first Reagan term. In fact, it is entirely conceivable that the 1988 Presidential campaign will turn on deficiencies in America's defense capabilities—despite the antidefense rhetoric of the early and mideighties. For, in truth, there has not been a massive defense buildup. There has only been the redressing of the decade of neglect which began in the early seventies. Defense spending in the Carter years typified this neglect, constituting only approximately 24 percent of the Federal budget and 5 percent of our GNP. In 1961, in contrast, in peacetime under John F. Kennedy, defense spending equaled about 48 percent of the budget and 9 percent of GNP.

President Carter recognized the mistake of this neglect and underspending. He revised the projected levels of spending upward of his last 5-year defense plan. President Reagan has not outspent what Jimmy Carter planned. In fact, what was proposed in his original fiscal 1986 budget was below what Carter proposed for 1986. What the President has accepted and is included in this compromise budget is below what Jimmy Carter planned for fiscal 1985. I repeat, this year's recommended level is below what Carter proposed to spend for last year.

The reverse has happened with nondefense spending. Nondefense spending by both the public and private sectors has risen by $145 billion—also in 1972 dollars—over the same period. It has risen this much despite such substantial economic prosperity as a 24-percent increase in GNP and 25-percent growth of national income. Thus, the difference of our approach to defense spending, on one hand, and nondefense expenditures, on the other, seems to defy logic:

We are spending less on defense in the face of a greater external threat; and

We are spending more on domestic social programs, despite the high level of domestic economic prosperity.

The 3-percent real-growth defense budget will save nearly $98 billion from originally planned levels over the next 3 years. But before we applaud this short-term recoupment, let us examine the consequences. More specifically: since less defense spending means less capability, the Senate will ultimately be faced with hard decisions as to what commitments have to be reduced concomitantly with reduced spending. What commitments will the Senate reduce?

Will we reduce our presence in NATO, and will our allies see a return to the late seventies when Europe was a low U.S. defense priority?

Will we foster instability on our southern borders by ignoring Cuban subversion and Soviet encroachments into Latin America?

In the Middle East and Southeast Asia, will we be able to ensure the security of Israel, or of world access to precious resources?

Will our own States and territories in the Pacific Basin be secure, and our allies and friends there confident of our strength?

Will we be able to continue to support the friendly, independent, and stable nations of Africa?

The Secretary of Defense told the Senate Budget Committee on March 7 where cuts could be made; but they will expressly and necessarily limit our capability to continue all these commitments. This will force our attention back to the need to reconcile spending reductions, made willy-nilly, with our commitments. For example:

The deletion of C-5B aircraft will curtail our airlift capacity for contingencies worldwide, but especially in the Middle East and NATO.

A loss of 240 M-1 tanks will create greater risk in NATO.

The nonavailability of A-6E and A-6F fleet aircraft will make our worldwide force-projection capacity inconsistent with the threats that our carrier groups face in the Far East, the Indian Ocean, and the Mediterranean.

I warn my colleagues that morally we cannot cut our defense capacity without adjusting our commitments, nor can we look to DOD and the administration to make these difficult decisions alone. As a senior partner in defense policymaking, the Senate cannot escape its constitutional responsibilities. I will support reducing defense spending as agreed to in this compromise budget agreed to by the President. But I also warn my colleagues that I will continually remind them of their concomitant responsibility to ensure our national security adequately once they have taken the first step to cut defense spending.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I hope my colleagues' lunches were not interrupted by too many trans-Atlantic phone calls.

I would like to submit for the RECORD a couple of articles that are pertinent to informal discussions off the Senate floor right now.

These articles relate to the boondoggle-nature of military bases.

The statements follow:

GOLD BRICKS?

(By Richard Behar)

One of the oldest claims of budget cutters is that hundreds of millions of dollars can be saved annually by closing unneeded military bases. And one of the oldest political truths is that they can't be closed. Now there's some respectable evidence that closing a base doesn't guarantee local catastrophe. Rather, with some work, it can lead to even more jobs.

"The key to success or failure is local initiative," says William Laubernds, president of the Chippewa County Economic Development Corp., in Michigan's cold, empty Upper Peninsula. The Air Force closed a 4,500-acre base in Kinross township there in 1978. Gone were 650 civilian jobs, a $40 million payroll and 25% of the county's 40,000 population.

Today the base site contains a 1,200-unit housing development, a 1,850-acre industrial park, a railroad, power plant, shopping mall, waste-treatment facility, golf course and an airport, most gifts from Uncle Sam. "The military was actually still constructing buildings after they left the place," laughs Laubernds. "And we're turning around and offering leases at as low as 10 cents a square foot." A dormitory for soldiers is now a medium-security prison, and the entire former base employs 1,000 locals in 49 firms, many defense-related. "In the long run the community is probably better off," says Laubernds. "Every government program ends, and you better have something else planned with the private sector."

Rhode Island issued bonds to buy land at Quonset Point-Davisville in North Kingstown when the Navy closed most operations there in 1974. "At first it was devastating," recalls Fred Santaniello, manager of an industrial park that replaced the base. Now 73 companies from computer designers to seafood processors to car importers are housed there, he says. An 8,000-foot runway accommodates cargo jets. The largest employer, General Dynamics, pays $1 per square foot annually for 206 acres, building nuclear subs with 5,400 jobs, vs. 4,500 lost when the Navy left.

There are failures, too, since bases are often in faraway places. In Glasgow, Mont., an agricultural community about 150 miles from Billings, the Air Force closed a B-52 base in 1968. Gone were 4,000 jobs, and Glasgow's head count shrank 50%, to 4,500. The industrial park has only one paying tenant: a drug program operating out of the old military hospital. There's no use for the gymnasium, nightclub, chapel, movie theater and bowling alley and 2 million square feet of available space.

From 1961 to 1981, 94 major installations were padlocked, but none since. The Pentagon's Office of Economic Adjustment, set up in 1961 to help the transition, says most are now thriving industrial centers with a better than 1-to-1 civilian job replacement ratio.

Senator Barry Goldwater, the Arizona Republican, is studying a proposal for 22 military base closings across the country. One of his targets is Fort Devens, 35 miles outside Boston. Devens, an intelligence training center and the early home of the Green Berets, has a payroll of $194 million for 9,000 military and civilian personnel. But Boston and New England are in much better economic shape than they used to be. "We're much better able to absorb a closing if it ever happened," says Robert Cogan, chairman of a local industrial commission.

Cogan helped lead a fight to save the base a decade ago and doesn't relish the thought of taking on the Pentagon again. But things could be worse. Those 9,338 acres have enormous civilian potential. "From an economic development standpoint, it's paradise," he says.

Moral: There may be money in plowshares just as in swords. It just takes a lot of work.

THE MILITARY-BASE BOONDOGGLE

(By Randy Fitzgerald)

Historic Fort Sheridan sits on the shore of Lake Michigan, about 28 miles north of downtown Chicago. Established in 1887, the old Army base is now staffed mostly by recruiting and administrative personnel. While 62 of its acres are devoted to training or operations, and 32 to administration, over 150—including two lovely beaches and a superb 18-hole golf course—are used for recreation.

For more than a decade the Department of Defense (DOD) has wanted to close Fort Sheridan. This would save taxpayers at least $9 million annually, with another $50 million or more coming from sale of the property. An Army study is blunt: "No strategic or mobilization mission has been identified for Fort Sheridan." But fearing the economic impact of closure, members of the Illinois Congressional delegation used their legal and political clout to keep Fort Sheridan open.

Of the DOD's 4000 military facilities nationwide, at least 50 are obsolete and could be closed. Many were established long before modern communications, interstate highways and jet aircraft rendered them uneconomical and unneeded. If the military-base structure was realigned, savings to the taxpayers—as calculated in 1981 by the Office of Management and Budget and in 1983 by the Grace Commission—could be $2 billion a year.

But no military-base-realignment package has been sent by the DOD to Capitol Hill since 1979. The reason is that any attempt by the Pentagon to close unnecessary facilities is met by widespread Congressional opposition. Every state and about half of Congressional districts contain military installations, and the pervasive Congressional attitude, summed up by one lawmaker, is: "Protect my pork and I'll protect yours."

In the face of such reaction, it is little wonder that the Pentagon has practically given up on closing bases. "Tragically," says Rep. Denny Smith (R., Ore.), "national-security decisions are being thwarted by local political interests that sabotage efforts to provide a strong national defense in a fiscally responsible manner."

Until 1977, the Executive Branch enjoyed a relatively free hand in fashioning the nation's base structure. Then Congress passed, and President Jimmy Carter signed, legislation creating hurdles against closures. The new law required, first, that the Pentagon notify Congress when it is even considering closing a base. The Pentagon must then prepare economic-, environmental-, and strategic-impact studies that can take up to a year and $1 million each to complete. Finally, Congress can veto any closure simply by refusing to consider it.

President Carter's signature came back to haunt him a year later when Secretary of Defense Harold Brown released to Congress a list of 85 base closures and reductions intended to save taxpayers $337 million a year. Democrats and Republicans, liberals and conservatives, put aside their differences to join in opposition to the package of economies.

Consider the case of Goodfellow Air Force Base in Texas, described in a 1979 Pentagon study as "a small, single-mission training base with a relatively high per-capita operating cost." Shutting down the base, the study estimated, would save $11 million annually.

Sen. John Tower (R., Texas)—since retired—thundered that the elimination of Goodfellow was "a major national-security risk." Rep. Tom Loeffler (R., Texas), whose district includes Goodfellow, added language to the 1980 military-construction legislation ordering the Pentagon not to close Goodfellow until a new series of studies had been prepared analyzing the "socioeconomic factors in the affected area." Since 1981, Tower, then chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and Loeffler, a member of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Military Construction, added money to the military budget for construction at the base. They appropriated $41 million for new facilities, a ploy designed to make it even more difficult for the DOD to justify eliminating the base in the future.

Fort Monroe, Virginia, continuously manned since 1823, was targeted for closure because it is too old and too small. The Pentagon estimated savings of $10 million a year if the fort's occupants were transferred to another post a few miles away. Rep. Paul Trible (R., Va.)—now a Senator—whose district encompassed the fort, objected that closure would cause "severe economic disruption" to the surrounding community. Vowing to maintain the historic military post, he inserted into the 1980 military-construction bill the same language that helped prevent the closing of Goodfellow.

After the Reagan Administration took office in 1981, the DOD drew up a new list of at least 50 obsolete, under-utilized or too costly facilities. As news of the possible closures leaked out, the Northeast-Midwest Coalition, representing over 200 members of Congress, demanded a complete moratorium on base closings in their states. Rep. Margaret Heckler (R., Mass.)—later named Secretary of Health and Human Services—wrote the Secretary of the Army that she would "be severely constrained" from supporting any increase in the defense budget if Fort Devens in Massachusetts was closed. The protests paid off. The Administration abandoned plans to ask Congress to close Fort Devens or the other obsolete bases.

Though lawmakers argue that base closures would jeopardize the local economy, it need not be that way. Take, for instance, Benicia, Calif. When the Pentagon announced in 1961 that the 110-year-old arsenal there would be closed, it seemed that a killing economic blow had been dealt the surrounding community. With a payroll of 2400, Benicia's arsenal was Solano County's largest employer.

But some civic leaders recognized that the 2000-acre abandoned facilities—with a port, airstrip, roads and buildings already in place—posed a golden industrial-development opportunity. Today, the Benicia Industrial Park is home to dozens of businesses from specialty manufactures and warehouses to a refinery, employing over 4500 people.

Consider also the case of Kincheloe Air Force Base in Michigan's Upper Peninsula. When the $700-million base was closed in 1977, 700 jobs and $36 million in annual revenues were lost to the rural community of 26,000. But the closing proved to be an economic boon. The Chippewa County board of commissioners established a local economic-development corporation to offer low-interest loans and lease the land at bargain-basement rates. Nearly 30 companies have established commercial and industrial operations at the former base, creating more than 1000 new jobs. Reports Industry Week magazine: "Amazingly, in what was once a town of deserted buildings and shattered dreams, plans are now under way for the construction of additional facilities to meet expansion demands."

The experiences at the Benicia arsenal and Kincheloe Air Force Base are not unique. Numerous communities nationwide have overcome the initial shock of base closings to turn apparent disaster into an economic blessing.

A Pentagon-commissioned study of 12 converted military installations found that in most cases the base closure turned out to be a boon. "Not only have the local economies not suffered the severe setbacks anticipated," the study reported, "but civilian acquisition and operation have had unexpected benefits. In almost every case, the civilian jobs lost because of the base closure have been offset with an equal or greater number of new jobs."

If the budget deficit is to be lowered, Congress must summon the courage to shut down economically indefensible installations and place the national interest above shortsighted local concerns. No longer should Congress force the Pentagon into the business of combating unemployment and subsidizing the local economy of communities with costly, unnecessary military facilities. Shutting down just ten unneeded installations, says Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Barry Goldwater (R., Ariz.), would save one billion dollars a year.

Congressman Smith has introduced legislation to give the Executive Branch more flexibility in operating the military structure. His bill would limit the requirement for the Pentagon to perform lengthy, costly closure-impact studies. Smith has been unable to line up a single co-sponsor in the House or Senate. But the Congressman, a decorated F-4 combat pilot with 180 missions over Vietnam, vows to keep up the fight.

"Congress must remove the unnecessary legislative barriers that bar the President and the Secretary of Defense from taking the swift action necessary to manage our base structure efficiently," Smith says. "We need to shelter national-security decisions from local self-serving political interests."

To which beleaguered taxpayers can—along with letters of support to Rep. Denny Smith—add an amen.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, Senator GRASSLEY has offered an amendment to freeze defense budget authority for fiscal year 1986 at the level of inflation, and to increase these levels in fiscal year 1987 and fiscal year 1988 at 3 percent above inflation. That works out to $302.5 billion in fiscal year 1986, $323.4 billion in fiscal year 1987, and $346.8 billion in fiscal year 1988. Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger has urged this body not to pass the Grassley amendment, raising a number of objections relating to capability, costs, and commitments. I support Senator GRASSLEY in his efforts to regain control over runaway defense budgets, and I would like to take a few moments to respond to Secretary Weinberger's assertions.

In a letter to me dated April 25, 1985, the Secretary made eight general points, to which I will reply in turn. First, it is claimed that a defense budget freeze will not meet our national security requirements. National security, however, is not easily translatable into a dollars-and-cents figure; it is by definition based upon perceptions of United States and alliance interests, hostile threats, and the degree of power necessary to provide for the common defense. Naturally, these are assumptions which are subject to wide interpretation. Beyond a certain point, do we really gain an extra increment of deterrence by pouring a disproportionate sum of dollars into highly questionable programs? I do not believe that we do.

If we can be as creative in saving money in a sound way as we are in building new weapons systems, we can save money and have a sounder defense.

There is a further argument to be made on the question of requirements. National security has surely been defined too narrowly when we view it only in terms of military acquisition and the accumulation of hardware. Economic solvency is an essential prerequisite to sustaining defense strength. Cost over-runs and perennial inefficiency is detracting from a strong military establishment. Raging deficits, fueled in large part by excessive defense budgets, will reduce our security over the long run by weakening the Nation's defense industrial base.

Second, the Secretary asserts that programs are not made any cheaper by delaying spending this year. The assumption here, of course, is that stretched-out procurement raises associated costs—for example, through the necessity of restarting closed production lines. We seldom ask, however, just how genuine the program was in the first place, and whether we need to fund it year after year at ever-increasing budget authority. There are many such dubious programs in this year's defense budget.

Third, the Secretary maintains that a freeze will undercut our leadership in NATO and compromise the 3-percent real growth commitment. But as members of the first Reagan administration have acknowledged, percentage-increase commitments do not necessarily purchase commensurate gains in security. A stronger conventional defense cannot be measured solely by the dollar inputs, but rather must instead be measured by force posture outputs—outputs that depend mostly on less tangible yardsticks, such as innovative strategy and tactics, combat morale, where spending priorities are directed, and so on. Foolish spending commitments at 3 percent real growth is much worse than wise spending at zero growth. We have exceeded the expenditure of any of our NATO allies.

Fourth, the Secretary tells us that research and procurement will end up short-changed. Leaving aside the glaring need to reassess a number of provocative or unnecessary expenditures—particularly those falling under strategic modernization—the growth in noncompetitive bidding, supersecret research projects estimated by some to have increased by 52 percent this year alone without sufficient congressional oversight, and endemic procurement problems indicate a more-than-sufficient budget in research and procurement. When the strategic defense initiative organization within the DOD spends only 2.5 percent of its budget authority after nearly half a year of such authority, I do not see the pressing need to surge forward with these types of programs.

Fifth, the Secretary says that our military capability will be adversely affected. However, Senator GRASSLEY's fine report of February 7, 1985, details the large percentage increase in operations and maintenance spending over the past several years and the concomitant decrease in flying hours and steaming days. Readiness, therefore, cannot be said to depend on additional increases in budget authority.

Sixth, the Secretary argues that the Soviets don't freeze their spending on defense. Irrespective of this statement's validity—and we have seen historical spending patterns reevaluated downward by the CIA—this doesn't guarantee that Moscow is buying improved force effectiveness. The futile comparison of spending levels between the United States and the U.S.S.R. is, as historian Barbara Tuchman has written, rather like judging a beauty contest by how much the contestants spend at the hairdresser.

Seventh, the Secretary claims that a freeze will display a lack of resolve. I would contend that just the opposite will occur: A freeze will show that we are committed to economic growth and solvency just as surely as we are to military strength. Our resolve and international prestige are based on more than the amount of dollars we are willing to spend, and certainly overspend, on defense. I will discuss this in the future on the floor in more detail.

Finally, the Secretary says that his request for fiscal year 1986 is already $63 billion below the 1981 plan and $45 billion below last year's plan. These so-called budget cuts are based upon planning documents that initially asked for $1.6 trillion over 5 years, estimates that in turn were and in large part still are based on highly inflated threat projections. In reality, the defense budget will have increased by 26 percent in constant fiscal year 1986 dollars and by 47 percent in current dollars since fiscal year 1981, that is, including the first Reagan budget of fiscal year 1982.

A defense budget freeze, in short, will not only give us time to get our defense contracting house in order, but will greatly contribute to growth in our economy without jeopardizing the combat effectiveness and deterrent power of our Armed Forces.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I support the Hatfield-Grassley amendment to reduce the level of spending for defense in the Federal budget for fiscal year 1986.

The adoption of this amendment is essential in order for us to succeed in cutting the Federal deficit. Not only will it further reduce outlays—it will demonstrate Congress' resolve that no segment of the Federal budget should be exempt from savings as we attempt to bring the deficit under control.

As soon as it became apparent that decisive action was needed this year to attack the deficit problem, every Senate committee began to examine the programs within its jurisdiction in the search for savings. The compromise budget package which we have adopted achieves these savings through a combination of spending freezes and reductions which touch virtually every Federal program and every segment of society. Programs such as Mass Transit, Rural Housing Assistance, Education, Economic Development, Health Research, and many others have been asked to help shoulder the burden of reducing the deficit.

I have supported the budget package now before us because reducing the deficit is absolutely critical in order to keep our economic recovery on track. One of my chief concerns has been to assure that the reductions be balanced. It is essential for the public to know that Congress has acted, to the greatest extent possible, to assure that all elements of our society share in the burden of deficit reduction.

The administration's original spending request for the Department of Defense called for an increase of 6 percent in terms of real growth in the next fiscal year. I believe such an increase would be excessive, and am pleased that the compromise plan which we have adopted reduces that increase to 3 percent. However, at a time when the deficit crisis compels sacrifice from every sector of society and every segment of the budget, we must do more.

The amendment I am supporting will further reduce defense spending to zero real growth in the next fiscal year, resulting in budgetary savings of $21.5 billion next year and $115 billion over the next 3 years. This provides an additional 3-year saving of $17.7 billion beyond the compromise plan which has been adopted.

I do not think it is fair to ask the public to support stringent reductions in domestic programs and exempt the military from sharing part of the burden. Our national security will not be imperiled if, for 1 year, we tell the Pentagon to live on a diet of zero real growth. While a military freeze—that is, providing the same number of actual dollars in 1986 as we provided in 1985—would undoubtedly do harm to our shipbuilding, modernization, and conventional arms programs and could require shortsighted manpower reductions, I am convinced that the Defense Department could survive zero real growth with no real harm to essential components of our national security.

Every action we take in this budget debate will affect our Nation's economic vitality. If we succeed in reducing the deficit, our economic future will be a brilliant one. By adopting this amendment we will help to complete the job of reducing the deficit in a way that is truly balanced and fair.

I hope my colleagues will join in supporting this amendment.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I support a freeze in defense spending and my support for an across-the-board package including a defense spending freeze has been on the record for some time. However, I will vote to table the amendment offered by Senator GRASSLEY because I believe that this is not the best way—there should be a package, and because, in part, it is too early in the budget process to reduce defense spending. I have addressed the issue of the need for a package many times. Let me say a word on the second point. If we cut defense now, it will not go for deficit reduction, it will only be ploughed back into other areas of the budget. Indeed, Mr. President, I know of one amendment that may be offered which would transfer the $18 billion saved by freezing defense for a year to agriculture programs. Quite frankly, I would not mind taking that $18 billion and putting it into programs which benefit Pennsylvania and other States in the Northeast and Midwest. That money could go a long way toward maintaining Amtrak, urban mass transit, rural housing unemployment assistance, job training—I have a long list, Mr. President. And that is just the point. All of us have a long list of things we would like to accomplish, but the one thing we must accomplish is a reduction in spending, and a big one. We need to adopt a deficit reduction package that gets us on a path to a balanced budget by the end of the decade, and we will not do that if we start redistributing money in the budget. We need to cut money out of the budget, not redistribute it. So let there be no doubt—I favor a freeze in defense spending and will support it at the proper time as part of an appropriate package, but we have got to make some tough decisions first. We cannot balance the budget by taking money from defense and putting it back into other programs. We can only do it with across-the-board reductions in all programs, except those which protect our poorest citizens, devoting the savings to deficit reduction.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I support the provisions of the amendment offered by Senator GRASSLEY which would set defense spending at fiscal year 1985 levels and allow a 3-percent real growth rate for the next 2 years.

Let me make very clear that I am for a strong defense of our Nation and I support the procurement of the major military systems that are being brought into our Nation's arsenal as a result of initiatives taken by the Carter and Reagan administrations, such as the B-1 bomber, the Apache helicopter, the MX missile, and the Trident submarine. I intend to use whatever influence I may have in ensuring that our Armed Forces have the best equipment and the best living conditions possible to ensure a strong and vital protective force for our Nation and our allies.

Under the budget proposal before us, defense spending would climb to a level that is $35 billion higher—after inflation—than at the peak of the Vietnam war in 1968 and $81 billion higher than the peak year of President Kennedy's defense buildup. But along with the massive pumping of funds into the Defense Department has come wasteful spending of shocking proportions.

Not a week goes by without another story in the news of a $44 lightbulb or an $8,000 coffee pot or a $400 hammer that the Defense Department has used Americans' tax dollars to buy. Defense Department figures which show that despite an 87-percent increase in the procurement budgets for tanks and helicopters, we have only added 30 percent more tanks and 45 percent more helicopters to our arsenal clearly indicate that we are spending more and getting less. Add to this the frequent reports of enormous cost overruns and of weapons systems that either don't work or might not work due to workmanship errors or design problems and the result is a spending procedure that is out of control.

The Grassley amendment represents a positive approach to bringing to a halt the waste and abuse of the tax dollars that have been freely flowing into and out of the Defense Department. It is a critically important first step in bringing defense spending under control and in reforming defense spending procedures to prevent further waste. Right now, the American people are not getting the military force that they have paid for. This amendment is our opportunity to ensure that the national defense of the United States is protected by developing a military force that operates like a fine-tuned machine instead of an insatiable giant.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to advise the Chamber that time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. NUNN. Will the Senator yield to me 1 minute on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I will not vote for the Grassley amendment, but I would like to share with my colleagues a couple of thoughts I have on this subject.

First, I believe the appropriate level of defense spending today, considering the threat, is in the 3- to 5-percent range. Considering the deficit, I believe we have to have restraint in defense. I would agree with the Senator from Oregon when he said national security is defined in broader terms than just military spending and includes the economy of the United States. For that reason, I voted in the budget deliberations in the Armed Services Committee to go to a 3-percent level in 1986, 3 percent in 1987, and 3 percent in 1988.

Yesterday I voted against the continuation of the COLA at 2-2-2 by voting for the Hawkins amendment. I did that, though, and said to my colleagues at the time, although not on the floor, that if we had a responsible overall package I would vote to freeze COLA's preferably for 1 year. I have voted that way before. I do not consider the package to which the Grassley amendment is addressed, that is, the compromise package, to be responsible fiscal policy. This package that we are voting on never gets the deficit, according to the Congressional Budget Office, below $100 billion, even going out to 1990. The deficit in 1988 is $145 billion. I simply do not choose to go to my State and tell my elderly citizens that I voted to freeze their COLA in order to get the deficit down to $145 billion. If I am going to ask for sacrifice on the part of the elderly citizens and some of the most vulnerable groups in our society, then I think it ought to be in a cause which gets the deficit under control. By that I mean a 4- to 5- to 6-year glidepath that would get the deficit down to zero. Not $100 billion, but zero.

I feel the same thing about defense. Defense is, I think all of my colleagues know, one of my top priorities. I am not willing to see defense cut to zero growth in order to get the deficit down to $145 billion, but I add to that that I think Senator GRASSLEY and others have made a very legitimate point. Defense must play a role in deficit reduction. If this body votes on a package with a fiscal glidepath to get the budget under control over the next 4 to 5 to 6 years, then I will be prepared to vote to go to zero real growth on defense, which is what this amendment does.

I will not vote for the Grassley amendment, but I think the point is being made. I think the President has to recognize that we cannot continue down the road that he has chosen to lead us for the last 4 years, that is, an adamant refusal to look at new revenues, an adamant insistence on increases in defense, and a continued inability to project a budget which gets the deficit under $100 billion even with extremely optimistic economic assumptions and with Draconian cuts in some areas. So I am waiting on a responsible package. I think there is one being worked on. I happen to believe the only way we are going to reach these conclusions is to have a bipartisan approach at some point. If we do not, the country is going to suffer. I hope to be a part of that before this budget deliberation concludes.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Kansas for yielding.

Mr. GOLDWATER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

I just report that to my colleagues.

NOT VOTING—1

East

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator withhold for one moment?

Mr. DOLE. I will.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I deplore that conduct we have just witnessed. I remember holding a vote for 2 hours or more for a Member on the other side. To have that kind of display because it might have been a vote in the other direction to me reflects on this Senate. I really deplore that, I believe it should stop. It is the leadership's prerogative to determine when the votes are in. That was a legitimate waiting for an absent Member at the time. That kind of display, I think, really brings the wrath of the public on the Senate. We have a right to wait for every Member to come. I believe the leadership was right in waiting this time despite the fact that they knew the vote would not be for the side the majority leader was taking.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HECHT). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we know there was a motion to table the Dole-Grassley-Hatfield amendment. While we are waiting here for a minute or two, could the Chair advise what the vote was on that motion to table?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote was 48 yeas, 51 nays.

Mr. DOLE. Still the same.

[Laughter.]

Mr. DOLE. Based on that vote, we have been visiting with a number of people, without success at this time. It is now 5 minutes after midnight in Bonn, too late to place a call and have him come over. So we were discussing with the distinguished minority leader if there might be some way to accept the amendment on a voice vote. He is now making inquiries on his side.

I have talked with the principal sponsors—the sponsors of the amendment, Senator GRASSLEY and Senator HATFIELD. They are ready to proceed on a voice vote. I think we are just waiting for the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. President, while we are waiting for a final check, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I understood there were to be a series of votes and I was supposed to go to the funeral of my stepfather-in-law in England. The plane has left now. Was I incorrect about that assumption?

Mr. DOLE. No, Mr. President. I shall offer for myself conforming amendments on military retirees and civil service veterans. Then it is my understanding that, from that side, there will be a Medicare amendment.

I do not know if that is correct or not. That would be followed by additional amendments. As I have indicated from the start, the two big sticking points were COLA's and defense. We saw the need to resolve those up front so we could start working on a final package. So, the Senator is correct. I guess there could be three or four rollcall votes yet this evening and probably some tomorrow.

Mr. PELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOLE. We do hope to leave at a reasonable time tomorrow because I know a number of Senators on both sides have indicated a desire to do so.

Mr. DIXON. Will the majority leader yield for a moment?

May I say to the majority leader, without any criticism whatsoever, that I canceled midafternoon and dinner events last week and there were no rollcalls. I have engagements this Friday, which I am perfectly willing to cancel. I understand my first duty is here, but can we have some assurance we should go ahead and cancel them? I hate to keep people waiting. I am perfectly willing to stay here and vote tomorrow. But the first engagement would be early in the morning, and it is a major business group in the Rock Island area. I would sort of like to let them know if I am not coming. I have no problem about not coming.

Mr. DOLE. I would indicate to my friend from Illinois that we intend to come in early in the morning, and there will be amendments. Now, I cannot demand rollcalls.

Mr. DIXON. No, but the Senator does expect to do business tomorrow?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. We have been expecting to do business all week, and we have done a little. I do not know whether it is the right kind of business.

Mr. President, I do suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think the distinguished Senator from Alabama wishes to make a statement, but I believe we can dispose of the amendment. I have discussed it with the manager, and I think he is prepared to accept the amendment.

I am happy to yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I only want to make a statement to the effect that I oppose the Grassley amendment and I wish to be recorded as having voted "no" on a voice vote. I did not feel that we would do it on a voice vote. However, I have discussed it with a number of Senators, including the leadership on both sides of the aisle; and rather than delay the proceedings of the Senate further, when we need to get on with the business, I am not going to object to a voice vote. Neither will I request the yeas and nays on this amendment. But I clearly want it understood that I oppose this amendment.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have run the cloakroom line on this side of the aisle. We have no objection to proceeding with a voice vote on this matter, and I personally recommend that we do that. I join the majority leader in making that request.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, is all time yielded back on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment (putting the question.)

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is requested. Senators in favor of the amendment will rise and stand until counted. [After a pause.] Those opposed will rise and stand until counted.

On a division, the amendment (No. 46) was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRANSTON and Mr. GRASSLEY moved to lay the motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The cosponsors of the amendment are: Mr. DOLE (for himself), Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. TRIBLE, Mr. ROTH, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. WARNER, Mr. DOMENICI, and Mr. STAFFORD.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate voted to make no adjustments to Social Security cost-of-living adjustments. The majority leader disagreed with that result and voted against the Hawkins-D'Amato amendment.

Nevertheless, if we are going to make no adjustments in Social Security COLA's, many Senators believe that equity demands that we not make adjustments in other pension programs, such as civil service retirement, military retirement, veterans' benefit, black lung, and other miscellaneous pension programs.

Accordingly, I have offered an amendment on behalf of the distinguished chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee [Mr. MURKOWSKI]; the Senator from Virginia [Mr. TRIBLE]; and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. ABDNOR], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD]. This is simply a conforming amendment that follows from the Senate's action yesterday on Social Security.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I support this amendment. I did not favor putting back full cost of living adjustments for Social Security, and I had ample opportunity to explain why yesterday. My view did not prevail, nor did that of the majority leader.

Frankly, I have been of the opinion since I started this budget process this year—it seems months ago—that if we were going to modify in any way the cost-of-living index for any of the pension plans, whether to freeze them for 1 year, or provide a guarantee of at least 2 percent that was before the Senate, we should treat all retirees alike—that is, military retirees, veterans pensioners, veterans compensation, retired Federal employees, Coast Guard retirees, black lung retirees, and so forth. That is why I support the pending amendment. Since we have used the word "fair," I think it is only fair that we treat all pensioners the same.

This amendment will add about $7 billion to the deficit. That means, when you add this to what we did yesterday on Social Security, we will be adding a little more than $30 billion to the deficit. I am not for adding to the deficit, obviously, but I think that in the interest of fairness, we should treat all retirees alike. I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment tonight. I believe it is the right thing to do.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. QUAYLE). Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CRANSTON addressed the Chair.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield Senator CRANSTON such time as he requires on the amendment.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION—COMPENSATION AND PENSION COLA'S

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I rise in support of the pending amendment. This amendment would provide for full cost-of-living adjustments, in fiscal year 1986, 1987, and 1988, in, among other benefits, VA compensation benefits paid to service-connected disabled veterans and to the survivors of those who die from service-connected causes, and in VA pension benefits paid to needy, non-service-connected disabled and aged wartime veterans and to the needy survivors of wartime veterans. These COLA's would be provided at the same percentage as the Social Security COLA's on which the resolution—as amended by the Senate in adopting the Social Security full COLA amendment—is premised, that is, the COLA's scheduled to be granted to Social Security beneficiaries under the indexing provisions of current law.

As my colleagues are aware, on behalf of myself and the other Democratic members of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, Senators DECONCINI, MATSUNAGA, MITCHELL, and ROCKEFELLER, as well Senators INOUYE, SARBANES, KENNEDY, EXON, RIEGLE, LEAHY, BURDICK, and BINGAMAN, I am planning to offer an amendment to provide for adequate levels of funding for veterans' programs. On April 2, I announced my intent to offer this amendment in a letter sent to all Senators. I had the amendment printed in the RECORD on that same day.

The pending amendment, by providing for full COLA's in VA compensation and pension benefits, would eliminate just one of the inequitable results that the so-called Reagan/Senate Republican leadership agreement would impose upon our Nation's veterans and which our amendment would correct.

To make the other changes that fairness requires, I still intend to offer those portions of that amendment that address other issues in function 700, veterans' benefits and services.

As presented to the Senate, the Republican leadership/Reagan package would apply to the VA's service-connected disability compensation and need-based pension programs the same arbitrary, complex COLA-reduction formula it has proposed to apply to Social Security and which the Senate has now rejected. Thus, instead of COLA's at the administration-projected inflation rates of 4.1, 4.3, and 4.1 percent in fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988, respectively—on which the Republican leadership/Reagan budget proposal is premised—The President proposes to cut veterans' compensation and pension COLA's by more than half, to only 2 percent, in each of those years.

FAIRNESS TO VETERANS

Major veterans organizations have stated clearly that if all COLA's are foregone in fiscal year 1986 so should be VA compensation and pension COLA's. Presumably, they would be equally as willing to share in an across-the-board COLA's reduction—although perhaps not one that cuts into their COLA's in each of 3 years running. In any event, that is not what the Republican leadership/White House package entailed and, with a full Social Security COLA, now approved is not what the pending resolution would entail.

Rather, in addition to the fact that the President's package would provide Supplemental Security Income and Food Stamp beneficiaries with full COLA's in all 3 fiscal years, a full COLA for Social Security would also now be given. But either way, the full compensation and pension COLA's should be provided.

I have heard the argument made with respect to the COLA's for SSI and Food Stamp beneficiaries that veterans should not feel that the Reagan/Republican leadership package discriminates against them, that they should acknowledge fairness in a policy that enable benefits for welfare recipients to keep pace with inflation while denying such treatment to those who served our Nation in time of war and those disabled in military service.

That argument plays on the conceptual distinction between compensation and pension, which are considered benefits earned through honorable service, on the one hand, and welfare programs, such as SSI and Food Stamps for low-income persons, on the other hand, which are not earned benefits. But, this argument turns the distinction inside out. Veterans' benefits, by virtue of being earned benefits, are more—not less deserving of favored treatment.

The Reagan/Republican leadership package seemed to consider veterans especially deserving of unfavorable treatment. And not that the Senate has gone on record as supporting full Social Security COLA's, that unfavorable treatment would be aggravated if the pending amendment is not approved.

COMPENSATION

The VA's service-connected disability compensation program has been and should remain a top priority of the Congress. Under this program, benefits are paid to the veteran to replace the average impairment of earning capacity attributed to his or her service-connected disability, and benefits to replace lost earnings are paid to the survivors of those who die from service-connected causes.

In the cases of many seriously disabled veterans, VA compensation is the only source of income.

Based on the administration's projections of inflation, in the case of a 100-percent service-connected disabled veteran, the reduced COLA formula on which the resolution is premised would mean the loss of more than $2,100 over the 3-year period encompassed by this resolution, and over $4,400 in a 5-year period. Assuming 45-year-old totally disabled compensation recipient lives to be 65, the loss for those 20 years would total almost $29,000 If COLA rates remained at 4 percent after fiscal year 1988.

It has been asserted that the Republican leadership package treats service-connected disabled veterans and the survivors of those who have died from service-connected causes more equitably than did the version reported by the Senate Budget Committee, which would simply have denied them a COLA in fiscal year 1986. The fact is, however, that the Republican leadership package would even more seriously erode the value of compensation benefits than the Budget Committee had proposed.

Based on the Administration's projections for Social Security COLA's, as of December 1, 1987, compensation for a veteran with a service-connected disability rated totally disabling would be $420 per year less under the Republican leadership package than it would have been under the Budget Committee's proposal. Through the end of fiscal year 1990, the totally disabled compensation recipient would receive $1,044 less under the Republican leadership's COLA reduction proposal than under the Budget Committee's 1-year freeze.

PENSION

In the case of VA pension—a needs-based program as is SSI—individuals would be penalized simply being wartime veterans or survivors of wartime veterans since SSI, as well as Social Security, recipients would receive full COLA, but VA pensioners would be at the reduced level.

The argument has been made, however, that denying pension recipients, but not SSI recipients, a full COLA is fair because the benefit levels under the new Pension Program, enacted in 1978 in Public Law 95-588, are significantly higher than SSI benefits. This argument seems to attempt to create the false impression that VA pensioners are fairly well off and that there is no need for their benefits to keep pace with inflation.

That is just not so.

Veteran-pensioners are truly needy individuals who are either 65 or older or permanently and totally disabled. Those eligibility criteria parallel SSI. The improved VA Pension Program enacted in 1978 is a very strict needs-based system.

The income standard applicable to a 70-year-old World War II veteran with no dependents is $5,709 per year. If the veteran receives $3,500 per year in Social Security benefits and no other non-pension income, his or her pension would be $2,209 per year—$184 per month.

In the case of a Vietnam-era veteran who is permanently and totally disabled and has a spouse and one child, the income standard is $8,446. This family of three would have only $705—about $235 per person—per month to live on. Do they not need full protection against inflation?

Can low-income persons such as these afford—as the President and the Republican leadership proposes—to suffer a reduction of nearly 7 percentage points in their benefits over a 3-year period? Is that the expression of gratitude and special consideration that the Senate, the Congress, and the Nation intends for those who have answered the call and taken up arms in time of war?

Mr. President, the April 15, 1985, booklet entitled "Senate/Administration Deficit Reduction Plan" provides the following one-line justification for the reductions in COLA's for VA pensioners: "Since pension cap exceeds poverty line, COLA restraint will not result in any veteran falling into poverty." That's one line stating two concepts and both of them are false.

It is simply not true that the pension income standards are above the poverty line generally. In fact, the levels are above the poverty line only in the cases of veterans with no dependents or only one or two dependents. The pension income levels permitted for a veteran with a spouse and two children and all those with more than three dependents are already below the poverty line.

For example, a veteran-pensioner with two dependents in 1984 received $8,160 for the year while the poverty line, determined by the Bureau of the Census, for a family of 3 was $8,280. Moreover, the VA pension income standards for all surviving spouses are well below the Census Bureau's poverty level figures. For example, the pension provided to a surviving spouse with no dependents in 1984 was $3,695—that's 30 percent below the $5,280 poverty level for a single person for 1 year.

The second part of the justification—that "COLA restraint will not result in any veteran falling into poverty"—is as wrong as it possibly could be. All, I repeat, all veteran-pensioners under the current Pension Program who are not already below the poverty line would be pushed down below the poverty line as the result of the Reagan/Republican leadership proposal.

As projected by the Education and Public Welfare Division of the Congressional Research Service, using Social Security trustees' economic assumptions, the 1987 poverty line for one person has been estimated at $6,060 per year; with 2 percent COLA's, the pension in that same year for a veteran with no dependents would be $5,939. Indeed, in 1987, the only veteran-pensioner group that is estimated to exceed the poverty line with 2 percent COLA's are those veterans with one dependent—and then only by $31. By 1988, even the veteran-pensioner with one dependent would, as already would have all other veteran-pensioner groups in fiscal year 1987, fall below the poverty line—the pension level would be $6,058 while the poverty line for a family of two in 1988 is estimated at $6,370.

Mr. President, I also note that, if full Social Security COLA's were granted, VA pensioners who have some Social Security income would—if VA pension benefits levels are not also increased commensurately—realize no real dollar increase in their total incomes from the 4.1-percent Social Security COLA. Their total incomes would increase by only 2 percent. Under the improved VA Pension Program, which was enacted in 1978 and took effect on January 1, 1979, VA pension benefit rates are based on the extent to which a pensioner's income falls below a given standard. For example, as I have noted, in the case of a veteran-pensioner with no dependents the income standard is $5,709, and if that veteran received Social Security benefits of $3,500 per year and had no other nonpension income, his or her VA pension would be $2,209 per year. Increasing that veteran's Social Security benefit by 4.1 percent to $3,643, while providing for only a 2-percent increase, to $5,832, in the applicable pension standard, would result in a decline in that veteran's pension—from $2,209 to $2,180.

Mr. President, this phenomenon of VA pensioners experiencing reductions in their pensions by virtue of increases of less than 2 percent would occur in all cases of VA pension recipients who have some Social Security income. In my view that would be an unfair, untenable result, and it can be corrected only by providing VA pension COLA's at the same percentage as Social Security COLA's.

I also note that, if a VA pension COLA is not granted at the same percentage as Social Security, VA pension recipients who are still on the rolls of the pension program that was in existence prior to January 1, 1979, could actually be made worse off financially.

When the current VA Pension Program took effect on January 1, 1979, the benefit levels of those who were on the prior Pension Program rolls as of December 31, 1978, and who thereafter remained on those rolls were frozen for so long as their incomes did not exceed the applicable income limitation under the prior program. Those income limitations are raised annually at the same rate that Social Security benefits are increased. Increasing Social Security benefits without increasing these limitations by the same percentage would undoubtedly mean that many pensioners would lose their entitlement to these prior-law pension benefits completely and actually suffer a reduction of income.

THE 2-PERCENT GAMBLE IS DEMEANING

Some might try to justify this unfair treatment of veterans by pointing out that the Republican leadership package would "guarantee" 2-percent COLA's in each of the 3 years even if inflation drops below 2 percent. The odds of that national lottery paying off are as poor as the logic behind that entire jerry-built device.

Veterans deserve fair, equitable, and dignified consideration under the budget. I consider it undignified and demeaning—as well as unfair and inequitable—to our Nation's service-connected disabled veterans to offer them in this budget proposal substantially less than full COLA's in fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 and to try to entice them into accepting it by promising to give them 2-percent COLA's in each of those years even if the rate of inflation does not justify those COLA's.

The suggestion that the possibility of unwarranted increases in these veterans' benefits would buy them off is insulting. They've never asked for unjustified COLA's. Who is it who thinks that such increases would be tempting to them?

In any event, it sure didn't work since all the major veterans' organizations support my amendment restoring full COLA's.

Moreover, Mr. President, if one were to assume that, against all odds, the inflation rate in fiscal years 1986, 1987, or 1988 were to fall below 2 percent, why should the Federal Government pay 2-percent COLA's in Social Security, retirement benefits, and VA compensation and pension rates? If, for example, the actual rate were only 1 percent in these years, the total cost in VA compensation and pension would exceed $100 million per year. The Federal Government would thus be paying out hundreds of millions of dollars with no policy justification for doing so that I can perceive.

Yet, those considered the most needy group of welfare recipients—SSI recipients—would not share in this windfall. Nor would food stamp recipients.

Mr. President, there is one further quirk in the pending resolution without any justification that I can comprehend. In the event that inflation is unexpectedly high in any of the 3 years involved, compensation and pension COLA's would be higher than 2 percent—but the amount of the COLA's would not be based solely on how high the rate of inflation was. Rather, the COLA's would be based on how far off the administration's current estimate of inflation turned out to be.

For purposes of illustration, if the applicable inflation rate were actually 5 percent in each of fiscal years 1986 and 1987, the COLA's would be 2.9 percent in fiscal year 1986 and 2.7 percent in fiscal year 1987. The reason for this difference would be that the administration's estimate of 4.3 percent for fiscal year 1987 would be closer than its 4.1-percent estimate for fiscal year 1986. The question I cannot answer in my own mind is what the size of the error made by an OMB forecaster has to do with sound public policy and with the real needs—for food, clothing, shelter, and other necessities—of the individuals who receive the benefits involved.

Surely, no one expects the inflation rate to be below 2 percent for any of those years; so the so-called carrot is truly misleading.

The pending package seeks to transform the provision of COLA's in these vitally important VA programs into tawdry gambles—tosses of dice that are plainly loaded in the administration's favor with a cynical and totally ill-conceived minimum COLA guaranty thrown in as an illusory sweetner.

What a terrible array of unfair, absurd policies this COLA reduction proposal entails!

The Senate should reject it overwhelmingly and, by so doing, restore a measure of fairness, dignity, and sound judgment to the budget process.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, Mr. President, I strongly support a full COLA for VA compensation and pension recipients and military and civilian retirees.

Providing these COLA's would represent the first step—only the first step, but an essential one—toward making this budget resolution one that affords our Nation's veterans the fairness with which they deserve to be treated. The opportunity for taking the remaining necessary steps will occur when we offer our amendment to deal with other inequities in the Reagan/Senate Republican leadership cut in veterans' programs.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise to offer support for the amendment proposed by our distinguished majority leader, Senator DOLE.

Having been involved in many of the negotiation sessions conducted by the majority leader in the past several weeks, I know that he does not offer this amendment without serious concerns over the budgetary impact it could have if included in whatever final budget resolution is adopted by the Congress. He has expressed these concerns to me, Mr. President, and I would say to the distinguished majority leader that I share those same concerns. Nevertheless, by the same sense of fairness which has led Senator DOLE to offer this amendment, I am compelled to support its adoption.

Mr. President, prior to the adoption yesterday of the amendment offered on behalf of Senators D'AMATO and HAWKINS, all Federal pension recipients were treated equally under the assumptions of this budget proposal. All would have received at least a 2-percent cost of living adjustment—COLA—in each of the next 3 fiscal years. In the event the consumer price index [CPI] rises by more than 4 percent in any of those years, all would have received a further increase equivalent to the amount by which any rise in the CPI exceeds 4 percent.

I voted against adoption of the D'Amato/Hawkins amendment, Mr. President, because I firmly believe all Federal pension recipients should be treated equally and because it is necessary to restrain the growth of all Federal entitlement programs. If one group of Federal pensioners is called upon to sacrifice in order to reduce the huge Federal deficit by way of receiving slightly smaller COLA's in the future—than they otherwise would under present law—it is only fair that all others be called upon to accept a similar, reasonable sacrifice.

With the adoption of the D'Amato/Hawkins amendment, that is no longer the case. As the budget proposal now stands, should inflation rise by 3 percent or more in any of the next 3 fiscal years, Social Security recipients would receive slightly larger COLA's than would other Federal pension recipients. I voted against the amendment, in part, because I believe this to be neither fair nor equitable to veterans, military retirees, civil service retirees, or other Federal pension recipients.

Mr. President, now that Social Security recipients are slated to receive a full COLA, my belief that all Federal pension recipients should be treated equally causes me to vote for adoption of the pending amendment. This proposal would restore funding sufficient to provide all Federal pension recipients with full COLA's in the next 3 fiscal years.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, adoption of this amendment, coupled with earlier passage of the Social Security COLA restoration, significantly reduces the likelihood of achieving the savings necessary to prevent inflation and interest rates from again rising to levels that will destroy our economy. Therefore, I hope we have the opportunity to again consider the question of limiting the size of future COLA adjustments to all Federal pension recipients before a final budget resolution is adopted. While I am compelled to vote in favor of this amendment from an equity standpoint, I remain firm in my belief that reasonable sacrifices on the part of all Federal pension recipients will be necessary if we are to truly achieve budget savings of the size necessary to ensure a continued strong economy.

Congress, as well as the various Federal retiree groups, must understand that the solvency of their retirement funds is inextricably linked to and dependent upon a healthy economy. Without a vibrant, growing economy, there simply will not be sufficient tax contributions from working employees flowing into the various retirement trust funds to pay out full benefits plus cost-of-living adjustments to the various Federal retirees. Without deficit reductions of the magnitude proposed in the Senate-administration budget compromise, it is not reasonable to expect a healthy economy for this Nation in the years ahead, and the solvency of the several Federal retirement programs will again be in jeopardy. That is the crux of the matter, Mr. President, and that it why it is so important and necessary that recipients of all Federal retirement pensions support reasonable restraint and cost savings in the COLA's for their benefit programs.

Additionally, I believe that our older Americans who have given so much to our Nation also understand better than any one why we must end the irresponsible shortsighted practice of burdening our children and their children with our debts.

Thus, Mr. President, while I shall vote for this amendment in order to restore fairness and equity in the treatment of Federal pensioners, I sincerely hope we can revisit this entire issue and achieve a consensus for reasonable restraint and budgetary savings.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today in support of this amendment, conforming Federal and military retirement and veterans compensation with the actions taken restoring full CPI based cost-of-living adjustments [COLA's] with the Social Security system.

I would like to commend my colleague from Virginia, Mr. TRIBLE, forhaving taken the initiative on this important issue.

It is true that I was prepared to support COLA limits approved as a part of the White House-Republican Senate leadership package.

In fact, I voted May 1 with my colleagues in the Republican leadership, including Mr. TRIBLE, in favor of the Social Security limitation.

A 65 to 34 majority of the Senate rejected that proposal, however, thus departing from the leadership package and setting the budget resolution on a substantially different course.

Following the Social Security vote, and rightly so, our distinguished majority leader, Senator DOLE, called for the consideration of Senator TRIBLE's amendment conforming the other Federal retirement programs with Social Security.

This action is consistent with our intent to provide equitable treatment for all participants in Government retirement programs.

I understand the significant impact on the proposed budget package that this amendment will have.

However, I also understand that the issue of all retirement COLA's may be revisited later in the budget process.

We must remain consistent in this process.

It is my opinion that the retirement sector should remain whole in such debate, and that this conforming amendment is needed to adhere to that policy.

Above all, we must endeavor to sustain to a policy of fairness and equal treatment to all who depend upon COLA's.

In that context, Federal, Military, and veteran COLA's must certainly be awarded on the same basis as Social Security.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, as you are aware, I have been a long-time supporter of an across-the-board budget freeze as the best means of bringing Federal spending under control. The beauty of my budget freeze lies in the fact that it treats all programs equally. No one will be asked to relinquish benefits or funding so that other programs can be increased. Retirees should not be asked to take a cut in their retirement benefits to enable the Defense Department or any other Federal agency to increase its spending.

In light of yesterday's vote to restore the cost-of-living adjustment for Social Security recipients, I believe it is only fair to treat all retirement programs equitably. Treating all individuals equally is consistent with my across-the-board freeze. I cannot vote to exempt veterans pensions, railroad retirement benefits, military pensions, or civil service retirees from those eligible to receive a cost-of-living adjustment in 1986 or ask these persons to sacrifice their COLA's when other groups will not be asked to do the same.

We cannot reduce the deficit by treating Federal programs unfairly. We must take charge of our spending in an evenhanded manner. It is time to take an across-the-board spending freeze seriously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield myself time from the resolution on this side or from the amendment.

A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BYRD. Does anyone on this side have any control of the time on this particular amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader has control of the time.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair. Then I yield from the time on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, yesterday, in what I believe was a demonstration of the Senate's commitment to basic fairness, the Senate voted by a large margin to strike the provision from the White House-Republican leadership budget that cut cost-of-living adjustments for Social Security beneficiaries.

Now there is an amendment that is before us that will extend this COLA restoration to Federal civilian retirees, military retirees, and recipients of veterans pensions and disability benefits. The great majority of Federal civilian retirees and many of the military retirees and recipients of the benefits depend on those benefits in the same manner as Social Security beneficiaries depend on these payments. Oftentimes these benefits are the only income received by these recipients.

I think it is important, Mr. President, to extend the concept of equity demonstrated in this Chamber yesterday to these other retirees.

I support the amendment, Mr. President, and hope the Senate will adopt it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I might need off the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am delighted that the majority leader has presented this amendment. I think it is exactly what we should be doing to conform to the vote we had yesterday.

I think it is clear that the COLA recipients, the people who are receiving cost of living should be treated the same way, and I think that is the purpose of this amendment.

We have said that we were not going to impose the COLA minus 2 for 3 years on Social Security recipients. Now that we have said that, this conforms to see that that will not happen to Federal retirees, military retirees, and Federal worker retirees, and veterans. Those are areas that we certainly should treat the same.

Mr. President, on our side we are just checking the amendment, and it will take us just a few minutes to determine if we feel it does conform to each of these programs.

So I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield as much time to the Senator from Wyoming as he desires. But let me yield myself 30 seconds.

I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the impact of this amendment be printed in the RECORD. This table shows that the amendment would increase the budget outlays by $7.2 billion itemized by each Federal pension program. The amendment will now return these programs to current policy—full COLA's.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OTHER COLA'S TO BE RESTORED TO FULL VALUE IN LINE WITH FULL SOCIAL SECURITY COLA

Program and 3-year effect

Military retirement ($2.1 billion).
Civil Service Retirement ($2.7 billion).
Veterans' Pensions ($382 million).
Veterans' Compensation ($1.2 billion).
Federal Employee Workers' Compensation Administration ($18 million).
Foreign Service Officers' Retirement ($27 million).
Coast Guard Retirement ($37 million).
Black Lung Retirement ($57 million).
Coal Miners' Retirement ($100 million).
Total: $7.2 billion.
(Also affected: Miscellaneous other programs with COLA provisions but which are not pension/benefit in nature.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, if I may speak briefly on this issue, I am very supportive of the amendment of Senator DOLE conforming matters to what we did yesterday with regard to Social Security.

I think it is important, and I would add to what Senator CRANSTON has said that I serve as a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee and it is certainly a bipartisan effort as to what we do in the Veterans' Affairs Committee with regard to veterans.

The members of that committee, and their fine chairman, Senator MURKOWSKI, have done extraordinary work for veterans and will continue to do so.

Mr. President, what I advise and think you must be aware is that there will be presented an amendment by Senator CRANSTON that says the present amendment is phase 1 or step 1. I can tell you step 2 is an extraordinary one because it calls or will call for $4 billion of expenditures in addition to a very generous budget of nearly $27 billion for the veterans of this country.

I am a veteran. I am very proud of that.

The first step is fine with me. I am ready to go along with that and the majority of the body will.

As to the second step, Senators want to be sure that they are here and participating because it will be a blockbuster in cost. It adds back things that have never even been requested.

So I just want to be sure that my colleagues hear that this is an issue that will be revisited. Equity and fairness are the words we hear, and I agree with that. I think it is a good step, but equity and fairness will not lead us to an additional $4 billion in a 3-year period as an amendment which will be presented as phase 2 or step 2.

I did wish to suggest that to the body.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for yielding.

I rise in support of this amendment. I am pleased to join with the majority leader in offering this amendment today.

Mr. President, since the Senate has approved full COLA's for Social Security benefits, fairness dictates that Federal civilian and military retirement benefits, as well as the veterans' pension and compensation benefits, be fully indexed for inflation, as well. To limit the cost-of-living adjustment for Federal retirees and veterans while the COLA's for Social Security recipients are fully indexed is an injustice to those individuals who have dedicated their lives to Government service.

Mr. President, as the Senate looks for ways to restrain Federal spending and reduce the deficit, our solutions must be equitable. All of us are part of the problem and all of us must be part of the solution.

Without this amendment, the Federal retirees and veterans will be saddled with a burden which the Senate has determined to be too onerous for Social Security recipients. So, in the name of fairness, I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will take a moment to say that many Senators believe that equity demands that we at least temporarily put everything back where it was. But I would also indicate that it is my hope that we revisit the COLA matter later on, if not this week, next week.

This amendment will produce $7.2 billion in lost savings added to the $23 billion lost yesterday. That is about $30 billion taken from the package.

Some would say, "Well, we made up $17 billion of that today by cutting defense, and you could probably get the rest by raising taxes."

I would say that the vote yesterday came as no surprise. We anticipated that. I think we probably anticipated the vote today on the 0-3-3 defense proposal. And maybe that is the way it would have come out a week from now, but it makes it a little more difficult to negotiate when you start out from 0-3-3.

But, in any event, I believe it is still the hope of the veterans and civil service retirees and military retirees and Social Security retirees that we do something on the deficit. I would not want anybody to misinterpret what we are doing here to mean that it is all over. I would suggest just the opposite. I think it is just beginning. We will have additional votes this evening to see how far we want to extend dumping things out of the package.

I think we have reached a tentative conclusion on the two major items—on defense and Social Security. It seemed to many of us that we ought to address those issues. The White House and the President have an interest in those two areas. The President indicated 3-3-3 percent real growth was essential to defense. He did join the package on the basis of Social Security receiving a guaranteed annual COLA of 2-2-2; that is, a 2 percent increase in COLA's for the next 3 years. Both of those White House positions have failed.

But I hope that the President will understand that we made the best effort and that now we have to do something a bit different. Maybe not. We can always offer 3-3-3 later on defense or 1½-3-3 or 2-3-3. There are still hundreds of other combinations that could be pursued.

So I just suggest that anybody in a budget resolution debate who draws conclusions from one or two votes may not fully understand the process.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI. How much time does the Senator from Alaska desire?

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I would need about 3 or 4 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I rise to support the conforming amendment offered by my distinguished colleague the majority leader, Senator DOLE. This amendment would grant full COLA's to our Nation's veterans as well as for other entitlement program recipients.

Mr. President, as I noted yesterday in my floor statement when the Social Security amendment was pending, it would be important to consider the full impact that the adopting of such an amendment would have on the equal sharing of the burden of deficit reduction. It was clear to me that equity and fairness would demand that other Americans receive the same protection—military, coast guard and civil service retirees, among others.

In the same selfless spirit which characterizes their duty to this Nation in good times and bad, the veterans, through conversations with their various representative organizations, have told me that they will accept reduced COLA's if other groups make the same sacrifice.

I find this attitude totally consistent with the high standards reflected in other issues the veterans have either sacrificed for or compromised on, and I commend their willingness to take the same sacrifices as we are asking other groups to take in these time of fiscal restraints. Certainly the veterans should not be asked to sacrifice any more than any other American.

It is the service and sacrifice of the men and woman who answered our Nation's call to arms that allows us the luxury of standing here today in freedom.

It is clear to me that if the Senate decided to endorse full COLA's for Social Security recipients, the veteran should receive no less. I continue to believe that veterans should receive the same COLA's as other beneficiaries of Federal entitlement programs. In fact, although I opposed the breakdown of the leadership compromise and therefore opposed the Social Security COLA amendment, I had planned to offer an amendment to restore full COLA's for VA compensation and pension recipients if the Social Security amendment was adopted and I made my intentions known to my colleagues yesterday.

Our distinguished majority leader has reached this very same conclusion. And since the Social Security amendment was adopted, he has decided to offer an amendment to restore COLA equity to recipients of other Federal entitlement programs. I fully support him in his decision, which I realize was most difficult to make in the context of working hard to keep the compromise from unraveling. However, I do endorse his decision and would urge my colleagues to support the amendment. At this time I also wish to note that as far as the rest of the compromise is concerned, I believe it is important to support the entire package as a reasonable measure to begin to tackle our burgeoning deficit. I would urge that other Members put aside individual concerns and join together to support the compromise which, although not perfect, is a worthy effort and should be endorsed and adopted.

I believe that Senator SPECTER, Senator STAFFORD, Senator SIMPSON, and Senator ABDNOR, also would like to join me as cosponsors.

I yield the floor to my colleague from New Mexico, the chairman of the Budget Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CHILES. I yield back all of my time.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield back all of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] is absent due to illness.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. EAGLETON] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

NOT VOTING—2

Eagleton	East

So the amendment (No. 48) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RIEGLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate to my colleagues what the program is for the remainder of the evening. I expect we will stay in until about 11 o'clock, and as I understand there may be an amendment, the minority leader just indicated, from that side, perhaps on Medicare, Medicaid. I am not certain. He did not indicate just what. So that will be the next amendment. I hope we can dispose of several amendments this evening. I would like to come in quite early tomorrow morning, say 8 or 8:30, and try to have four or five votes before 1 or 2, 2:30, 3 o'clock so we get the last plane to Chicago——

Mr. DIXON. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE [continuing]. For those going that way. And then I expect to have votes on Monday. Tuesday, as I have indicated before, we have some problems on this side that I need to consider, and it appears after 4 p.m. on Tuesday, maybe 3 or 4 p.m., there would be no votes. So if you want to plan dinner next Tuesday, it looks like a good time. We might have debate but no votes on Tuesday evening. On Wednesday, as I understand it, it is the hope of the distinguished manager that we might wrap up this package. At least Wednesday or Thursday. So that is the forecast.

There are how many hours left on the resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 24 hours and 34 minutes left on the resolution.

Mr. DOLE. We are already half finished and it has only been a couple, 3 weeks, so that is an indication of where we are.

Mr. LEAHY. Will the distinguished leader yield for a question? He said there may be votes on Monday. Is there a time before which there would not be votes on Monday?

Mr. DOLE. We hope to protect Senators until, say, 1, 2 o'clock.

Mr. LEAHY. 2:25 maybe, thereabouts.

Mr. DOLE. Can the Senator give me an indication how he is voting?

Mr. LEAHY. How would the Senator like me to vote? No, but the distinguished majority leader thinks it probably would not be until the first part of the afternoon before there would be votes?

Mr. DOLE. I assume we would not come in quite as early because there are Members returning from their States; we recognize that. I hope we could have votes on Monday. Obviously, if somebody did not want us to have votes, we would have votes on Monday.

Mr. LEAHY. That is all I am suggesting. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

RECESS UNTIL 6:45 P.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the Senate stand in recess until 6:45 p.m.

The motion was agreed to, and at 6:17 p.m. the Senate recessed until 6:45 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. GORTON]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, in his capacity as a Senator from the State of Washington, suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that the time for the proceedings under the quorum call be charged equally to the two sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCHRAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 49

(Purpose: Sense of Congress that minimum taxes ought to be imposed on corporations and individuals, to be used for individual income tax rate reduction)

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] reserves the right to object.

The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD] for himself, Mr. DOLE, and Mr. RUDMAN, proposes an amendment numbered 49:

At the end of the pending amendment, add the following: It is the sense of the Congress that revenues should be increased and it is assumed that the Committees on Finance and Ways and Means will raise these revenues through legislation providing for payment of minimum taxes by corporations and individuals on the broadest feasible definition of income to assure that all of those with economic income will pay tax, and it is further assumed that the resulting revenues be used to reduce individual income tax rates and to increase the threshold amounts for tax payments by individuals in connection with consideration of comprehensive tax reform legislation.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BYRD. I yield myself 30 seconds.

I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not understand his request. I did not understand he was sending an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOMENICI. Under the procedures of the Budget Act, it is my understanding the proponents of the amendment will have one-half hour and the opponents will have a half hour. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proponent has one-half hour and the manager has one-half hour, if he opposes the amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. The manager of the bill on this side does not oppose the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In that case, then, the minority leader controls time in opposition.

The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, this is a sense-of-the-Senate resolution calling upon the Senate Finance Committee to enact a minimum tax both on individuals and corporations. I define minimum tax to mean a tax that will guarantee that all corporations and all individuals, whatever their source of income and whatever their source of deductions or preferences, will have to pay some tax. The sense-of-the-Senate resolution does not call for a tax increase. It is revenue neutral. It provides that any money raised by minimum tax will be used to offset individual rates or to raise the threshold upon which taxes are levied so that we can eliminate from taxation some people at the lower end of the tax scale. But I emphasize again it is not a tax increase. It is designed to levy a tax on those who now have relatively large individual incomes and pay no tax or corporations that have economic income and pay no tax. And I emphasize again, they would pay it regardless of what their deductions, exemptions, or other tax preferences may be.

I also want to emphasize that this is not a substitute for tax reform. There are many who have been advocating a minimum tax I think as a smoke screen in the hopes that one would be enacted and we would not approach genuine tax reform.

That is an issue at hand. That is an issue that should be discussed, debated, and acted upon. As far as I am concerned, as chairman of the Finance Committee, I am going to do everything I can to get a tax reform bill to the floor of the Senate and through the Senate and through conference and to the President no later than the end of this year and hopefully earlier. This would be a part of a tax reform bill or if, for whatever reason, there is no tax reform bill, this would be a recommendation to the Finance Committee that we still enact minimum taxes so that the wealthy and the privileged, individually or corporate, cannot escape the payment of some taxes.

The time has come, Mr. President, when we can no longer have headlines as appeared in the Washington Post earlier this year. I am not blaming the Post, the story was accurate. The headline said that 299 individuals who made over $200,000 in 1983 paid no income tax.

Now, interestingly enough, the last paragraph of the story indicated that some 200,000-plus individuals who made over $200,000 paid something like $58-$60 billion in taxes. The story was that 299 who made over $200,000 paid no taxes. I am not here to argue the merits of whether or not their deductions were legal. As best I can tell, their deductions were legal. I am talking about now either changing the law so the deductions are not legal or in essence saying no matter what your legal deductions are, at the end of it all, if, after you take all your deductions, exemptions, and preferences, you would otherwise have paid no tax, you will pay some tax.

Mr. President, it is imperative that a minimum tax, a real effective minimum tax be passed so that all of the public in this country senses that all Americans, individual or corporate, are paying a fair share of taxes.

I was struck by a poll reported to the Finance Committee by Mr. Henry Block, of H & R Block, a number of years ago, when he testified. Obviously, Mr. Block has an interest in what the public thinks about taxes. He submitted a question at the time asking if they were in favor of tax simplicity.

He was stunned to receive an answer indicating, as I recall, that 85 percent supported tax simplicity. The reason he was stunned was that about two-thirds of the people in this country do not itemize. They have a simple tax. He indicated that even those who did not itemize might come to him—this was 6 or 7 years ago—and pay him $15 or $20 to do a simple tax, but he said it was more a form of insurance rather than complexity.

Still, he was so intrigued by the answer, when so few people had complicated taxes, as to why so many wanted simplified taxes, that he quizzed further; and he found that the bulk of the people, when they heard the word "simplicity," were answering "fairness," and they equated simplicity with fairness.

So that when he redrafted his poll to find out if the respondents were interested in simplicity for the sake of simplicity for themselves, less than 5 percent regarded it as a significant issue. They wanted simplicity because they were convinced that the complexity of the Tax Code allowed people to escape taxation who they thought should pay taxes.

Mr. Block was further intrigued when he discovered that the bulk of the people were not asking that their taxes be lowered. What they were asking was that everyone pay a fair share of taxes.

This resolution will call upon the Senate to enact a minimum tax for individuals and corporations which will ensure that they at least pay some taxes. When we have hearings on it, when we move it through committee, and when we bring it to the floor, we can debate whether or not it is enough, whether or not it is fair; but at least we can guarantee that there never again will be a headline that 299 people who made over $200,000 paid no taxes.

I will conclude by saying once more that this is not a tax increase. It is revenue neutral. It is intended to be revenue neutral. Any moneys raised from this minimum tax will be used either to lower individual tax rates—not corporate—or to remove from taxation those who are now at the lower end of the scale and perhaps pay some slight tax; but, through a feeling of fairness, we might decide that they should pay no tax. That would be the use of these revenues.

I call upon the Senate to approve this resolution and to call upon the Finance Committee to enact the minimum tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. RUDMAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire such time as he needs.

Mr. RUDMAN. I thank the distinguished chairman of the Senate Finance Committee for yielding time. I will be very brief.

Mr. President, the other night, when the distinguished Democratic leader made his response to the President, he covered a number of points that I could disagree with but one that I could surely agree with. He talked about the fairness of lower-income Americans paying income taxes of various kinds, while many American corporations and many individuals, through a variety of legal uses of our Tax Code, avoid any tax at all or, at best, pay a very small tax.

Of course, as I am sure the Democratic leader would acknowledge, the Members on his side of the aisle do not have a monopoly on fairness. I would say that the desire for fairness exists on both sides of the aisle.

The same evening that the distinguished Democratic leader spoke, I was struck by a commercial that has been running on all the television networks. Maybe my colleagues have seen it. If they have not, I commend it to them.

The commercial depicts a very expensively but casually dressed man in his 30's or early 40's leaving his very well-manicured home in the suburbs, walking by his very expensive, imported car, and sort of musing aloud.

He says something like this:

You know, I made a lot of money last year. Unfortunately, I also paid a lot of taxes. If I had invested in XYZ Corporation

I would not have paid any taxes at all. Next year, that's what I am going to do, because it is not what you earn; it is what you keep.

I think that commercial is going to probably cut down that company's business in the future; because that commercial depicts the essential unfairness of the Tax Code as well as anyone can do it; Madison Avenue has pulled it off.

So I spoke to the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee late last week and said that I certainly hope we would not reject an idea soley because the distinguished Democratic leader happened to mention it on national television. The fact is that Senator BYRD was quite correct, and his views are shared by people on both sides of the aisle. The American people ought to know that Republicans in this body and Democrats in this body abhor the unfairness of the Tax Code.

At a time when we are asking the American people, in this budget resolution, to make numerous sacrifices, it seems at least to me, and I hope to a number of my colleagues, that, at the very least, we should pass legislation that would say to the Senate Finance Committee that we should now rake in some of those dollars that have been sheltered, and sheltered so well for so long, and put them in the pockets of middle and lower-income Americans who, in my view, are paying more than their fair share.

I urge that we demonstrate fairness by supporting this resolution.

I thank the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee for yielding to me.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire. I thank him for cosponsoring the resolution.

Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee. It is a most responsible committee.

A GOOD IDEA IF USED FOR THE RIGHT PURPOSE

A broad-based minimum tax to assure that corporations and wealthy individuals cannot avoid paying their fair share of income taxes and to provide revenues to reduce tax rates and increase the amount of income an individual can earn before being subjected to income tax meets the essential requirements of fairness and equity. Everyone should support this amendment.

LONG-TIME ADVOCATE

This Senator has favored, and, more than that, actively and successfully worked to limit the ability of profitable corporations to avoid taxes. In 1982, as chairman of the Finance Committee, I led efforts to enact a minimum tax. We, in fact, included a much more broad-based individual minimum tax as part of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act.

The President also included a proposal for a more effective minimum tax as part of his fiscal year 1983 budget. However, fierce lobbying from industries that would have been affected, as well as several technical problems, caused us to take a different approach. Instead of a corporate minimum tax, we decided to attack the problem directly by reducing the value of tax preferences used by corporations to avoid taxes.

The Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act reduced by 15 percent percentage depletion for coal and iron ore, bad debt reserve deductions, interest paid deductions for financial institutions for debt incurred to purcase tax exempt obligations, DISC tax benefits, depreciation recapture on real property, special writeoffs for pollution control facilities, intangible drilling costs, and mineral exploration and development costs.

MANY MINIMUM TAX SUPPORTERS DID NOT SUPPORT TEFRA

Some of my colleagues may remember that, despite this direct effort in TEFRA to help assure that profitable corporations and wealthy individuals pay income taxes, it was very difficult to get enough votes to pass the Senate.

The vote on passage of the Senate's version of TEFRA was 50 to 47. The following Senators voted nay, and I ask unanimous consent that the names be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the names were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senators Baucus, Bentsen, Biden, Boren, Bradley, Bumpers, Burdick, Byrd, Cannon, Chiles, Cranston, DeConcini, Dixon, Dodd, Eagleton, Exon, Ford, Glenn, Hart, Hawkins, Heflin, Hollings, Huddleston, Jackson, Johnston, Kasten, Kennedy, Leahy, Levin, Long, Matsunaga, Mattingly, Melcher, Metzenbaum, Mitchell, Moynihan, Nunn, Pell, Proxmire, Pryor, Randolph, Riegle, Sarbanes, Sasser, Stennis, Tsongas, and Zorinsky.

MINIMUM TAX IS A GOOD BACKUP TO BASIC REFORM

Mr. DOLE. If Congress does its best in addressing basic tax reform, every individual and corporation should pay a fair share of regular income tax. But this Senator, for one, has no illusions that all tax incentives will, or should, be repealed as part of any tax reform effort.

As long as we retain tax incentives in the code, there will be the possibility that some corporation will use so many of them that it will pay little or no regular income tax. A broad-based minimum tax is an effective way to provide a backstop to the regular income tax.

The resolution focuses on the integrity of the Tax Code in requiring that the tax burden be distributed more equitably among our citizens. It does not suggest that a minimum tax should be used as an expedient way to raise taxes and avoid spending restraint.

REVENUES ARE NOT THE CAUSE OF BUDGET DEFICITS

What we have is not a lack of taxes, but a lopsided distribution of taxes. Revenues, as a percentage of GNP, have risen from 18.1 percent in 1966 to 18.9 percent in 1986. This does not support contentions of a revenue hemorrhage.

The share of Federal revenues borne by individuals has, however, risen in the last 20 years. In 1966, individuals, through income and payroll taxes, contributed 49.8 percent of Federal revenues. In 1986, this percentage is estimated to be 61.3 percent.

Over the same period, the corporate share of Federal receipts has decreased from 30.7 percent to 25.1 percent.

A minimum tax should be used to help redress that imbalance, not merely to raise taxes.

Mr. President, I think this is a good idea if the money is used for the right purpose. That is precisely why, before we start talking about more taxes and locking somebody in, we should wait and see what develops, as the distinguished chairman has pointed out.

I am advised that the Secretary of the Treasury will unveil the so-called administration proposal on tax fairness and tax simplification within the next 2 weeks.

The whole thrust of the tax fairness program is to do away with preferences, to do away with a lot of tax shelters, for rate reduction. That is precisely why we mention rate reduction—individual income rate reduction.

I believe the record is fairly clear that I have been a long-time advocate to end the ability of profitable corporations to avoid taxes.

Many minimum tax supporters did not support TEFRA in 1982. In fact, the vote was 50 to 47 on this floor, and I am advised that had the other 3 Members been present, it would have been 50 to 50, and it would not have passed. So I suggest that some people who talked about tax fairness—and we closed about $100 billion worth of loopholes in 1982—did not vote for the package.

One of the Senators who opposed us on TEFRA was the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM].

I know he is concerned about tax fairness. He is very astute, and he understands the Tax Code.

But at least at that moment he could not vote for the tax fairness bill we brought out here.

I make the final point: The reason we do not want to raise taxes just so we do not have to cut spending revenues is not the problem. The problem is spending.

I think this is a good approach. This should excite the Senator from New Jersey who is just coming in the Chamber. He looks excited. We are pleased.

So it just seems to me this is an opportunity to start the ball rolling on all this tax reform and tax fairness. We are talking about rate reduction, not using the money so we do not have to make tough decisions on spending cuts.

I am afraid that is a proposal that many have in mind.

I applaud the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee and the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire who raised this question a few days ago, and I hope that we will have a unanimous vote, and I have discussed this with members of the Finance Committee. They appreciate this approach. They are sincere in their efforts to do it. But they do not believe we ought to be raising taxes just to spend more money.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, as chairman of the Finance Committee, I can assure the majority leader of the Senate that it is not my intention to consider any tax increase proposals. I am perfectly receptive to tax reform, tax changes, tax fairness. If we get a tax reform bill before the year is out I am willing to work with the President and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee on it.

I echo what the majority leader said. This is not a tax increase. It is a minimum tax. Money will be used to lower taxes on individuals or to remove from the tax rolls those at the lower end of taxation who perhaps should be removed from it altogether.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

The Chair reminds Senators the 30 minutes in opposition to the amendment is controlled by the minority leader and the proponent of the amendment controls the time in support of the amendment.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am wondering if my friend from Oregon will yield for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield?

Who yields time?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to Senator LEVIN 5 minutes on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I wonder if my friend from Oregon will yield for a question?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes, I am happy to yield for a question.

Mr. LEVIN. As he knows, I have been a strong supporter of a mimimum tax on corporations and individuals for some time, and indeed we have discussed this matter with him and a number of other Senators in this Chamber.

I am all in favor of making sure that tens of thousands of profitable companies that now pay no taxes and wealthy individuals who now pay no taxes finally pay some taxes.

I think I am in agreement with my friend from Kansas on that also. It is long overdue.

So I am going to be voting for this resolution, even though I think the purpose to which it would apply, is too narrow and we should apply some of this to the deficit, because I do think that some of the money which will be raised from people who have for too long escaped paying taxes should be applied to one of the biggest problems we have in this country right now, which is the deficit.

So, as my friend from Oregon knows, when the time comes at the Finance Committee, I would be plugging away there at a hearing urging that some of these funds be applied to deficit reduction.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I say to my good friend from Michigan part of the reason I am introducing this is as a result of the conversation he and I had in my office one day about the minimum tax. He introduced a good minimum tax bill. I think many of his ideas are good ideas. Senator METZENBAUM introduced a minimum tax bill as did Senator CHAFEE; and Senators BENTSEN and DANFORTH also have one in.

We can have a debate at the time. We are all agreed that loopholes should be closed, and we will have a very good debate at that time whether or not the revenues should be used to reduce the deficit or reduce taxes. That is a fair debate.

My preference would be to use them to reduce taxes, but that is for another time.

Mr. LEVIN. I take it then that is an open question, is it not?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Anything is an open question so long as you have 51 votes one way or another. When we start to have hearings on it that issue will be fully aired.

Mr. LEVIN. I take it in supporting this kind of resolution I will not be preempted from arguing when the time comes that we ought to be using those revenues for deficit reduction.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Absolutely.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

The minority leader has control of the time in opposition.

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, will the chairman of the Finance Committee yield for a question?

Mr. BYRD. How much time does the Senator wish?

Mr. BRADLEY. Five minutes.

Mr. BYRD. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The distinguished Senator from New Jersey is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, this resolution, which I have seen in the last 30 seconds, purports to be a resolution that calls for lower rates and a broader based income tax system that is revenue neutral.

My problem is perhaps only with the language, and maybe the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee could change that language, but as it now reads, and I think it may be unintended, it says, "It is the sense of the Congress that revenues should be increased * * *"

We are dealing with a budget resolution. If revenues are increased, that is a tax increase and we do not have revenue-neutral tax reform.

So I wonder if it is the intention of the chairman of the Finance Committee to raise taxes with this resolution because, as it is now written, it raises taxes.

Mr. PACKWOOD. It is designed to raise certain taxes on those corporations and individuals who now pay no tax and it is designed to use those revenues to reduce individual taxes or to remove from taxation those at the lower end of the scale who pay some tax and in fairness should pay none.

In toto, the resolution is revenue neutral. But clearly you have a minimum tax levied on individuals and corporations who now pay no tax. Their taxes are going to go up.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I understand what the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee has said. In tax reform some people who do not pay taxes are going to have to pay taxes. I understand that. But that does not lead to an overall increase in revenues.

Mr. PACKWOOD. No. If you look at my——

Mr. BRADLEY. If you have a tax system in which 10 or 20 percent of the people do not pay any tax and you put a minimum tax on, they are going to have to pay more tax, but that does not increase the overall revenue number, if you are going to cut the taxes of those people who are not using the loopholes. Now I do not think it is the intention of the chairman of the Finance Committee to support a resolution that raises taxes. That is contrary to what the President has said tax reform should do. It is clearly contrary, I think, to what the intention of the Senate is.

Mr. PACKWOOD. If the Senator will notice, on line 8, the phrase "resulting revenue"—this is the increase in taxes we are going to get from people who now pay no tax, and it will be "* * * used to reduce individual income tax rates and to increase the threshold amounts for tax payments by individuals in connection with the consideration of comprehensive tax reform legislation."

I do not know how it could be written anymore clearly than to be revenue neutral.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I do not know if I am quite getting through to the distinguished chairman. Indeed, the resulting revenues from a minimum tax, according to this, will be used to reduce individual income tax rates and to raise the amount someone can earn before they have to pay any taxes. No one has any disagreement with that. But that does not increase overall Government revenues.

I understand that if you began with the second clause of the sentence, you could very well say you want to take the revenues that you derive from a minimum tax and you want to cut individual tax rates appropriately and raise the floor before someone has to pay any income tax. If that is the intention, then the Senator should simply eliminate the first clause which says revenue should be increased.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The bill clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO 49, AS MODIFIED

(Purpose: Sense of Congress that minimum taxes ought to be imposed on corporations and individuals, to be used for individual tax rate reduction

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I send a modified amendment to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD] modifies amendment No. 49 as follows:

At the end of the pending amendment, add the following: It is the sense of the Congress that tax legislation should be enacted to provide for payment of minimum taxes by corporations and individuals on the broadest feasible definition of income to assure that all of those with economic income will pay tax, and that the resulting revenues be used to reduce individual income tax rates and to increase the threshhold amounts for tax payments by individuals in connection with consideration of comprehensive tax reform legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment and his amendment is so modified.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I am grateful to my colleague from New Jersey, Senator BRADLEY, for calling to my attention the fact that the original amendment might have given the impression that this was a net tax increase. As this now is drawn, it is very clear that we are encouraging the Finance Committee to enact minimum tax legislation on corporations and individuals that now pay no taxes and that whatever revenues are raised from that tax shall be used for individual tax reduction or for removing from the tax rolls those at the lower end of the scale who, perhaps, in the sense of fairness, should be removed from paying any taxes.

Once more, I wish to thank my colleague from New Jersey, Senator BRADLEY, for calling that to our attention.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask that the time be yielded to me from the opposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator that the minority leader controls the time in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I think we ought to understand what the issue is before this body. This proposal does nothing. It is mere conversation. It says what the sense of the Congress is, and I think that is fine. But I think we ought to be dealing with realities. We are on a budget resolution here and the budget resolution ostensibily is for the purpose of putting in place the will of Congress as it pertains to the amount of income we will have and as pertains to the amount of expenses that we will have.

Now, it is a known fact that the Senator from Ohio, with the support of several Senators from that side of the aisle as well as some on this side of the aisle, has proposed a minimum corporate tax. The minimum corporate tax that we proposed is the very minimum corporate tax that the President of the United States proposed back in 1982. I do not have any idea where he is on it at the moment, but I know that when I offered it on the floor of the Senate about a year ago I only received 30 votes.

Now this amendment, which is not a substantive amendment, is only a sense-of-the-Congress resolution saying we ought to move in on the issue of minimum corporate taxes and minimum individual taxes, on to impose a minimum tax on the broadest feasible definition of income to assure that all of those with economic income will pay taxes. That is fine. I have no problem with that.

But I have a lot of problems about the further assumption that the resulting revenues to be used to reduce individual income tax rates and to increase the threshold amounts for tax payments by individuals in connection with consideration of comprehensive tax reform legislation.

That is blarney. That is just saying you are going to take the money and you are not going to do anything about reducing the deficit. The American people are out there crying for us to reduce the deficit. Business organizations are pounding at our door, saying, "Reduce the deficit." Democrats and Republicans are all standing on the floor, saying, "We want to reduce the deficit."

So some of us would like to submit an amendment providing for minimum corporate tax and some would like to propose an amendment advocating a minimum individual tax. Why should 65 major U.S. corporations make $49.5 billion in the last 3 years and not pay any Federal income taxes and in fact receive $3.2 billion in refunds? Why? Why should the five largest defense contractors receive $620 million in Federal tax refunds even though they did not pay a penny of tax on their profits of $10.5 billion

Why should General Dynamics, a leading defense contractor, which has not paid any taxes since 1972, continue to have that privilege? And why should W.R. Grace and Co., headed up by that great balancer of the budget, Peter Grace, who has claimed that we, Congress, lack the guts to deal with the deficit, why should his company have been permitted to earn $684 million in profits and pay no taxes? In fact, they managed to collect $12.5 million in tax refunds.

Now, I support the first half of this amendment, I have no problem with it. But I have a great deal of problem with the second half of it, which assumes that all those dollars are going to be used to reduce individual taxes.

Frankly speaking, I do not hear the American people pounding at our door saying, "Reduce our taxes, reduce our taxes." Of course, everybody would like to have their taxes reduced. Who among us would not?

But that is not the issue. The issue is priorities in this country. I have heard Senators who have been on the floor saying everybody has to sacrifice. We have to call upon everybody to sacrifice equally. If that is the case, why are we proposing that we eliminate 17 programs, cut back on so many other human service programs, cut back on Medicare, Social Security, and so many other matters of that nature and yet refuse to take in some money by minimum corporate and individual taxes. Why should we say that we will only use those dollars to reduce taxes?

I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry if I may have the attention of the Parliamentarian.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator should state his inquiry.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I ask the Parliamentarian whether or not this resolution is subject to a division since the first portion of its relates to the matter of the collecting of taxes, and the second portion of it has to do with an assumption as to how the funds will be used.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. No. I am waiting for my inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has the inquiry under advisement.

The language of the amendment, if divided, would not be grammatical. It does not appear to be subject to division since each divison has to stand on its own as a substantive entity.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Parliamentarian not agree that each portion beginning with the phrase "and it is further assumed that the resulting revenues be used to reduce individual income tax rates and to increase the threshold amounts for tax payments by individuals in connection with consideration of comprehensive tax reform legislation" could stand on its own as per the original portion of the resolution? The Senator from Ohio is prepared to ask for a division.

Mr. President, I ask for a division of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Would the Senator please indicate where he wishes the amendment be divided?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes. The first portion of the amendment would be concluded by saying "to assure that all of those with economic income will pay taxes." And the balance then would be the second portion which would have to do with how those funds would be used.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the manager of the bill allow me 5 minutes more off the bill?

Mr. CHILES. Five minutes off the amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, on my time I ask the Senator, the author of the amendment, whether it is not the fact that the thrust and intent of this resolution is to effect that such revenues as will be produced by the minimum taxes are to be used to reduce individual income taxes, to increase the threshold amounts for tax payments by individuals and that they will not be used to reduce the deficit?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, that indicates that they will be used to reduce taxes as I indicated to the Senator from Michigan earlier. When the committee considered this, the majority is the majority. The majority on this floor is the majority. It is the intention of the sponsors of this amendment to use the revenues to reduce individual taxes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. And not to reduce the deficit? That is the intention of this resolution?

Mr. PACKWOOD. We hope by the time we are done this week, we will reduce the deficit by reducing spending.

Mr. LEVIN. Will my friend yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Without losing my right to the floor, I yield for 30 seconds.

Mr. LEVIN. I wonder on that basis if I could ask the chairman of the Finance Committee a question; that is, I asked before whether or not one could consistently vote for this resolution since I am so much in favor of minimum taxes on corporations and individuals, and yet consistent with that positive vote argue that the proceeds of that minimum tax be used for deficit reduction. At that time, I believe his answer was, "Absolutely." Subsequent to that, the words "assumption" or "further assume" had been stricken by a modification to which he agreed. Would his answer to my question be any different now than it was then?

Mr. PACKWOOD. The answer would not change. The Finance Committee is governed by a majority vote and this body is governed by a majority vote. Whatever we choose to do with the revenues, we will do.

Mr. LEVIN. In your view, one could consistently vote for this resolution, and then argue that the proceeds could be used for deficit reduction?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes. I do not want to mislead my friend. The proceeds could be used to reduce individual taxes, but in my view, that does not bind the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Is it your view that one could consistently vote for this resolution and then argue from that that the proceeds be used for deficit reduction?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. If that is the case, what the Senator from Oregon is saying is that we could pass this, but the Senate is always master of its own destiny, and if 51 Senators want to vote to reduce the deficit at a later point, they can do that. But the fact is that the resolution as presently drafted does not indicate that it is to be used to reduce the deficit.

We are in a parliamentary situation where no amendment is possible to this resolution, nor to any other amendment which is offered. I would ask the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, in view of his responses to the Senator from Michigan as well as his response to me, whether then he would be willing to include in the resolution language indicating that it is assumed that the resulting funds could be used to reduce individual income tax rates, to reduce the amount of tax rates by individuals, or to reduce the deficit in connection with the consideration of comprehensive tax reform legislation? Would he be willing to put into this resolution some indication, a recognition on his part, that these funds could be used to reduce the deficit, which so many of us feel strongly should be the case?

Mr. PACKWOOD. In answer to the Senator, my preference is to use it to reduce individual income taxes. I can be overruled. We can come up with an amendment where somebody strikes out "individual" and it passes. I want to stress on the record that these funds be used for the reduction of individual income taxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired. Who yields time?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator yield an additional 2 minutes?

Mr. CHILES. I yield an additional 2 minutes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Under the circumstances, I want to urge my colleagues to vote against it, and I urge them to vote against it because it is wrong. On a budget resolution where we are trying to reduce the deficit, this proposal would not accomplish our intent.

When I asked the chairman of the Finance Committee if he would be willing to amend the resolution to provide that the funds from a minimum corporate or individual tax could be used for the purpose of reducing the deficit, his response is, well, it could be. But the fact is that the thrust of the resolution indicates exactly the opposite.

I then asked him to change the language so that it would indicate that that would at least be one of the alternatives, and he was not willing to do that.

Under those circumstances, if you want to reduce the deficit, if you want to balance the budget, you ought not to be voting for this resolution. But if you just want to put in a minimum corporate tax or a minimum individual tax and as a consequence thereof reduce taxes somewhere else along the line, maybe for some of the wealthy of this country who we always seem to take care of so well, then so be it, then vote for it. But I for one want to vote against it and will offer at a later point a minimum corporate tax in order that this body may actually express itself and indicate that it wants a minimum tax on corporations and wants it for the purpose of reducing the deficit.

Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not been.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will whoever controls time yield me some time?

Mr. PACKWOOD. How much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eight minutes and thirty-nine seconds.

Mr. BUMPERS. How much time is there in rebuttal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proponents have 8 minutes 39 seconds. The proponents have 8½ minutes and the opponents have 3 minutes 39 seconds.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I thank the distinguished Senator for yielding.

I do not need much time because I think what I am about to say will be fairly unpopular. I do not want to let this moment pass without making it clear to my colleagues that I think it is time to draw a line on some of the emotional rhetoric about whether corporations pay taxes. It may well be in due course that the Senate Finance Committee ought to report some kind of minimum tax legislation. I may vote for it and support it and it may be a wonderful idea.

But the notion is gaining in this Chamber, and I regret to say in some learned journals of opinion and even out of the country, that somehow the corporations of this country have connived to avoid paying taxes.

So far as I am aware, that is not true.

It is true that corporations, like other taxpayers, have taken advantage of the tax laws which have been written by the Congress of the United States. There are a lot of loopholes in the Tax Code. There are a lot of Members of this Chamber who had something to do with putting those loopholes in there.

For some reason or another Members have wanted to encourage what they deem to be socially desirable forms of behavior.

We had an energy crisis in this country and a lot of people were running around saying, "We ought to encourage more production of energy. We ought to have incentives in the Tax Code to get countries to explore and produce domestic energy." Those are loopholes.

Someone else said, "We ought to have more private enterprise jobs," so we created some tax incentives for corporations to employ people who would otherwise not be employed. Those became tax loopholes.

Somebody else said what we really ought to have to stimulate the economy in this country is a provision to have corporations make large capital expenditures—and I think it was President Kennedy—and from that came the tax credit, which some people think now is an egregious loophole.

My own position is that we can do without a lot of things in the Tax Code, those loopholes, or incentives, whatever you want to call them, including one or two that I might have had a hand putting in there, thinking that some socially desirable effect might thereby be served.

But the notion that somehow corporations have connived to do something is starting to get under my skin.

It also goes against my grain when Senators stand up and say these great corporations making billions of dollars in profits pay no tax.

That is, so far as I am aware, not the case. It is perfectly true that some corporations, as a result of provisions written into the Tax Code, pay no income taxes.

The other day the Senator from Ohio made some statements to the effect that there were a number of corporations that paid no taxes. He listed some of them. One of them he happened to list he said had gotten a tax refund in the last 3 years of $50 million, even though it had made large profits.

It so happens, according to the best information made available to me, if you think only of income taxes, this corporation paid about $100 million in taxes and did not get a $50-million refund as he suggested.

But the more revealing fact to keep in mind is this particular corporation paid about $4 billion in other taxes during the period in question. Maybe Social Security taxes do not count, but for the average corporation in this country, payroll taxes are far larger and more significant than are Federal income taxes. In most cases, just like for individual taxpayers, the payroll tax is a far bigger burden.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the manager yield 1 additional minute?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 3 minutes off the bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The point I was trying to establish is that for most corporations, just as for most individual taxpayers, the payroll tax is a far larger bite than is the income tax.

Let me just be plain about that. Whether you are talking about individual working men and women or large corporations, the payroll tax is a much bigger bite than is the Federal income tax. For a lot of individuals and some corporations, other forms of taxes also account for more than the Federal income tax. There is the windfall profit tax, sales taxes, Federal and State excise taxes, and property taxes.

I am not saying we should not have tax reform. I think President Reagan should be commended for spearheading this effort. I believe in due course we will have a tax reform bill. I personally hope it will be in the form and shape that I can vote for it myself, as I expect to. It may be that one feature of that will be some form of corporate minimum tax. I am not sure about that yet.

I also hope personally, let me say, Mr. President, that there would be some form of alternative maximum tax available for both individuals and corporations, and in the right time I would like to tell Senators about that because I think it may be the surest and best way to close a bunch of loopholes.

Mr. President, in closing, I want to send to the desk a statement in response to all of these charges about the horrible abuses, indeed the bloodcurdling stories, that have been told about how these corporations are getting away with murder, they are not paying taxes, they are not even paying as much taxes, we are told, as some poor widow up in Wisconsin who pays more taxes than these corporations. It just is not so.

Now, income taxes are one thing, but other kinds of taxes are something else. And with respect to 11 of the 13 companies which have been specifically mentioned by name, my statement responds to that and to the best of my knowledge proves the point I just made. There are two corporations we have not yet heard from.

Finally, Mr. President, let me say that it is distasteful to me personally to talk about tax policy in terms of individual taxpayers, even in terms of corporate taxpayers, because the issue of what is right and wrong, it seems to me, is better understood by resort to general principles than to the kind of emotional appeals that point out this big taxpayer or that big taxpayer.

Mr. President, I thank again the manager and the Finance Committee chairman for yielding to me.

My own belief is that this is not the end of the debate; it is just the start, and I must say I am looking forward to it. Tax reform is long overdue in this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator from Colorado requesting that the document be made a part of the RECORD?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes. I thank the Chair. I send it to the desk in the hopes that my colleagues grant unanimous consent that it be incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR ARMSTRONG

During the floor debate on April 25, 1985, I provided for the record some initial information I obtained to counter statements that were made that some corporations which did not pay federal taxes from 1981 to 1983 "had a free ride from their government for the last three years, who have not paid a penny in taxes."

Having now spent more time in gathering this information I would like to provide it for the record. The results are interesting and revealing and totally refute the argument that the corporations whose names appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the 25th of April do not pay taxes and the information counters the impression left that these corporations are not doing their civic duties in the way of paying taxes. One of the facts that I have found is that some oil companies pay sizable amounts in Windfall Profits taxes and that these are deductible from federal income taxes and therefore reduce those taxes by considerable sums. Those of my colleagues who criticize these corporations for not paying any federal income taxes should understand this.

I would like to share this information with my colleagues and others who are interested in learning of the factual findings that were provided to me through the companies listed below.

TAXES PAID FOR TAX YEARS 1981–83

Corporations	Federal	State/local
Air Products	$2.1 million	$112 million.
Allied Corporation	$291 million	$715 million.
American Cyanamid	$139.1 million	$120.1 million.
Champion International	$162.9 million	$135.1 million.
DOW Chemical	$311 million	$243 million.
DuPont	$125 million	$2.9 billion.
Greyhound	$11.1 million	$340 million.
Martin Marietta	$15 million	$319 million.
Texaco	$2.4 billion	$1.9 billion.
Union Carbide	$296 million	$297 million.
Xerox	$422 million	$135 million.

Note.—Federal taxes include Federal income tax, minimum tax, windfall profits tax, Superfund taxes, the employer portion of Federal payroll taxes, Federal unemployment taxes and some Federal excise taxes. State and local taxes include State and local income taxes, property taxes, sales use tax, State and local unemployment taxes. Some corporations combined their Federal and State employment taxes. The Record of April 25, 1985 incorrectly reproduced the Texaco press release and other direct taxes should have been $1.9 billion.

Mr. President I would like to take the opportunity to make a few additional comments regarding corporate taxation. It is not perfect and there are undoubtedly some inequities. We are about to embark on the road of tax reform with President Reagan at the forefront and I welcome thorough review of the federal tax system. These corporations contributed significant amounts to federal and state coffers. According to the 1984 Annual Report of the Commissioner and Chief Counsel of the Internal Revenue Service for fiscal year 1984 corporate income and profits taxes exceeded $74 billion dollars, the highest dollar amount of collections in the history of the country.

Any rush to judgment about the level of corporate taxes should take into account such features as the deductibility of windfall profits taxes and other taxes paid, the role of subsidiaries which pay taxes relieving the parent of some tax burden, deferred taxes, taxes paid on a world-wide basis and a host of other features. Some of these features in the tax code reduce tax liability others are meant to achieve fairness.

Another method available to make some judgments regarding corporate tax burdens is to look at corporate income as a percent of GNP. In 1984 corporate income was 6% of GNP and for FY 84 9% of all federal revenue came from corporate income taxes. It is true that corporate income as a percent of GNP has declined through the years. In 1950 the percent was 14% and in 1960 it was 10%. The reduction of corporate taxes as a percentage of all federal revenue follows this decline. Corporate taxes as a percent of federal revenue has declined since 1975. At that time corporate taxes accounted for 41% of federal revenue, then 32% in 1980, 29% in 1982, then up to 32% in 1983 and for FY 84 it was 25%. These figures come from the Commerce Department National Income Accounts. Despite this trend corporate revenues in dollar terms have never been higher, as I mentioned above.

The Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 was intended to reduce tax rates for individuals and corporations to provide economic incentives to work, save and encourage business investment. That has occurred and as a result the entire Nation benefits. Tax avoidance cannot be tolerated but in the rush to end those limited instances where it exists let's do so with care and deliberation.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I thank the Chair and I thank my colleague from Florida.

I think we have to stop playing games. I am not talking about the Senator from Oregon. I am talking about all of us. We face a very, very tough problem in this deficit. I think it is the No. 1 problem, by far. Tax reform is popular. And I know this resolution is going to carry. My vote is going to be against, but it is going to carry. But the No. 1 problem that the people of this country want us to deal with and we ought to be dealing with is this question of the deficit, and that is going to require revenue. Let us face it. We all admit it privately. Too few of us are saying it publicly. And we ought to be saying it publicly.

I talked privately to a top official of the Reagan administration, not about whether there should be increased revenue but how you get increased revenue. And right here on this floor yesterday we passed—I voted for it because I do not want to put this on the backs of senior citizens—the Social Security COLA amendment. We cannot pass those kinds of amendments without implicitly saying to ourselves, "You have to have some revenue. We have to face the music."

I remember when I was first elected to the State legislature in Illinois, and a man in South Roxana, IL, sent me a letter. He had 13 points to his letter. The first 12 were increased services he wanted from Government, and the 13th point was cut taxes, and believe it or not we have almost adopted his program.

We have to face the music. I do not mean any disrespect now to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, the chairman of the committee, or the distinguished Senator from Florida, the ranking member, because times are different, personalities are different, but I served for 6 years in the House Budget Committee, and I can remember when you had——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 3 minutes has expired.

Mr. CHILES. I yield the Senator 2 additional minutes.

Mr. SIMON. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator only has one-half minute remaining.

Mr. CHILES. Off the resolution, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMON. I can remember when Senator Muskie chaired the committee, Senator Bellmon was a ranking member, and we faced the unpopular questions in a bipartisan mood recognizing that there were no popular answers. I think that is where we are today. We are facing a situation where there are no popular answers. Democrats are, frankly, hoping Republicans are going to come up with the unpopular answers. Republicans are hoping Democrats are going to come up with the unpopular answers. I think we ought to pull together and not adopt, with all due respect to my friend from Oregon, this kind of a meaningless addendum to this budget resolution. We ought to be facing the tough realities, and I hope soon we get down to doing that. I thank the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute off the resolution to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I have a question I would like to pose to the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee. I applaud the Senator from Oregon for offering such a resolution. When he originally proposed it, I had the greatest intention of voting for it and I still might, but not having my glasses on tonight and not wanting to go back to the office to get them, I would like to ask the Senator what I think I see on this page. It would imply that we are about to change drastically the zero bracket amount when I see "all of those with economic income will pay tax." That is lines 6 and 7.

To me it says that if one of these young pages comes and works a month or two and maybe makes $1,000 during the summer, that would be economic income and therefore a tax would be paid. I was under the impression that we were around $3,000 or $3,400 before an individual had to pay a tax. That is my question. Is that what the resolution says?

Mr. PACKWOOD. No. The remainder of the resolution, roughly the last four lines, indicates that the revenues from this will be used either to reduce individual rates or to remove from taxation those at the lower end of the scale. So there is a dual purpose to the use of the revenues and clearly taxes would not be raised for those at the $3,000, $4,000, $5,000 level.

Mr. PRYOR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRADLEY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BRADLEY. I thank the distinguished minority manager of the Budget Committee for yielding.

Mr. President, I would simply like to confirm what the chairman of the Finance Committee has stated, and I would like him to respond to my statement. This is a resolution which says that we shall broaden the tax base by eliminating certain credits, exclusions, and deductions, so that we arrive at economic income, and that the revenue which we derive from that reform will be used to lower individual tax rates and to raise the threshold that someone must go beyond before they reach the taxable income level. Is that not correct?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes; although I want to make sure that we are not talking about eliminating preferences. In essence we are saying regardless of the preferences, regardless of the fact that the law allows you to deduct A, B, C, D, E, you are going to pay some tax. We are going to say henceforth, no matter what your preference, you are going to have to pay some tax.

Mr. BRADLEY. That introduces another issue into the debate. As I read this document, it says to provide for payment of minimum taxes by corporations and individuals. Now, I believe the way you get the most effective minimum tax is through tax reform, and tax reform is by getting people who do not pay, to pay, and taking that revenue to reduce tax rates and to raise the threshold before they have to pay any taxes. I do not think the distinguished chairman means otherwise.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I want to make sure my good friend from New Jersey understands what I am saying. This calls for a minimum tax on corporations and a minimum tax on individuals, so you no longer have these stories that the privileged and the rich are escaping taxation. It may or may not raise a great deal of revenue, depending upon where you set the percentage. I share my good friend's passion for tax reform.

I want it clearly understood that I do not regard the minimum tax as a substitute for tax reform. It can be a part of a tax reform bill. It could stand on its own, as a matter of fact, if we did not get any tax reform bill, and I think it should be enacted on its merits regardless of a tax reform bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. I think I hear the chairman saying that if a minimum tax were to pass, the revenue derived therefrom would be used to lower tax rates and to raise the threshold. Is that correct?

Mr. PACKWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. BRADLEY. I think it makes a very clear choice. This is what will inevitably be a much longer battle this year.

I think it is important to point out that given the choice between major tax reform and a minimum tax, we are better off if we go with major tax reform, because the minimum tax addresses only one of the three problems—that is, people who pay too little tax; we want to get the rates down, which is the second problem; and we also want to make this system fairer.

I think this resolution clearly signals the chairman's intent to use the minimum tax to get tax rates down and make the system fairer.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I assure the Senator from New Jersey that I do not regard this as the sine qua non of tax reform or that if we adopt this resolution we have all the tax reform we need.

Mr. BRADLEY. It is the chairman's intention to go much beyond the language of this, to further reduce tax rates much more than would be provided if we only referred to minimum taxes. Is that correct?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Absolutely.

As I read the Finance Committee and the Senate, we are not likely to pass such a minimum tax that it would produce so much revenue that we could dramatically reduce rates.

Mr. BRADLEY. It is also the chairman's intent, signaled by this resolution, that in revenue derived from a proposal such as this, we want to get more so that we can raise the threshold for lower income people. Is that correct?

Mr. PACKWOOD. The Senator lost me. Will he repeat that?

Mr. BRADLEY. The Senator stated that it is his intent that this is not the total picture, that to look at tax reform and the minimum tax is only a little bit, and it is his intention to go beyond that and get rates down further.

My question to the Senator, to confirm the same reasoning, is that it is also his intention to take any additional revenue to raise the amount people can earn before they have to pay anything. Is that correct?

Mr. PACKWOOD. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask for 2 more minutes.

I think that is very important in this debate, because the fact is that when we talk about a minimum tax—15 percent or 20 percent or whatever it is—we are ignoring the fact that a single person making $15,000 a year is in the 20-percent tax bracket, while a couple making $30,000 a year is in the 25-percent tax bracket. We want to get their rates down as well as taking care of people at the lower income level.

I am satisfied, from my perspective, that this is a positive resolution. It indicates direction. It also indicates that the intention of the Senate is to go much beyond what this resolution says in direct language. So I strongly urge the Senate to adopt this resolution and send a clear message about what our intention is for the coming debate.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I thank my colleague.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, one of the reasons we are here tonight in this debate is because of what we did in 1981.

Eleven Senators stood up and said: "If we cut taxes $750 billion over the next 5 years and then spend $1.8 trillion on defense, you are going to have major deficits big enough to choke a cow."

If there is anything people detest worse than a politician, it is a politician saying, "I told you so."

Here we are doing exactly what many Senators knew we were going to be faced with.

The President says, "Make my day." I am prepared to make his day. I am not going to vote for a package, first of all, that presumes to cut spending by $52 billion this year on the assumption that the unemployment rate is going to be 5 percent and the interest rate is going to be 5 percent in 1989. That is highly unlikely, and everybody knows this.

The CBO says that the President's proposal will cut spending not $52 billion but $37 billion. Thirty-seven billion dollars is the "honest-John" figure, and the increase in interest on the national debt alone in 1986 will be $24 billion.

The day before yesterday, CBO finally came up with figures that are set out in the RECORD, after the distinguished Senator from South Carolina had requested them, which show that the President, himself, is asking for increased spending of $118 billion. There are, admittedly, $15 billion in offsets. Cut it down to $103 billion.

Here is another scenario: Give the President the benefit of the doubt on his proposed spending cuts. Take the figures at face value. They are still asking for $103 billion in increased spending. So where is the deficit reduction?

The Senator from Colorado says, "I'm getting ready to say something unpopular. I don't think corporations are trying to shirk taxes." I have never heard anybody accused of saying anything unpopular when he says, "I don't think taxes should be raised."

Who were unpopular were 11 Senators standing on the floor in 1981 and telling the honest-to-God truth to this body.

So here we are. The President says, "Make my day." Well, I am prepared to do so; because if the President is telling me that 65 corporations in this country are entitled to make $50 billion in corporate profits in 1981, 1982, and 1983, and not only not pay one dime of income tax but also raid the public trough for $3.5 billion in refunds, and he tells me not to do anything about it, I am going to help make his day.

I am not going to vote for this resolution. My daughter just got out of college and is employed, and I was shocked to see how much tax she had to pay on her modest salary for 1984. But my concern is not the amount of taxes she has to pay. It is whether or not she will even have a job in the future. I am concerned what these deficits will do to our economy. So I am going to vote against this proposal because I like only 50 percent of it.

We cut taxes exorbitantly in 1981, and I recognize that raising the threshold would be a very desirable thing. It is like indexation. There is a powerful argument to be made for indexing income taxes. We all know the arguments. It is compelling and it is persuasive. However, as the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE] said one night, when he and I were trying to do something about it, it is a great idea. We just cannot afford it.

You can talk about deficits all you want and say that we have to do something about deficits. What we are saying here is that we have to do something about the deficits, but we don't intend to.

"Make my day." The sequel to that is that this country has to suffer economically instead of asking corporations to face up to their legitimate civic responsibilities. The corporations of this country in 1950 were paying 28 percent of all the taxes collected, and today are paying 6 percent of all the taxes collected in this country—if that is what it takes to make the President's day, if that is what it takes, frankly, in order to give the financial markets of this country some stability and confidence, I have no problem in voting for it. If the President vetoes it and this body sees fit not to override it, then we will just have to live with the consequences.

I cannot support the amendment.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Florida.

Mr. President, I heard the argument made a moment ago that these corporations that pay no income taxes had paid a great deal of ad valorum taxes, school taxes, sales taxes, and payroll taxes. But, you know, those are the same taxes that individuals pay. What we are talking about really is income taxes. Individuals pay them, and profitable corporations should pay them.

I congratulate the Senator from Oregon in bringing this to the attention of the Senate. Senator DANFORTH and I have introduced this kind of legislation, and Senator METZENBAUM and others have introduced this kind of legislation.

On April 15 you had the average family of four earning $25,000 a year paying about $2,500 in taxes, and sometimes really having to scrape to be able to do that. They then turn around and read in the newspapers that some major corporations, including major constituents in my State, are earning billions of dollars in profits and not only not paying taxes but getting very major tax refunds. And they read about other corporations not having paid taxes for more than a decade. When that fellow reads that, he says something is wrong with the system, the system is just not right, is not fair, and that we ought to do something about it. And that we should.

A corporate minimum tax is a first step. That is no substitute for reforming the tax system and trying to bring about more fairness and more simplification, but it is a step in the right direction, and we should be doing that.

I do not know when the tax reform bill is going to get over here. I am not sure when it is going to pass the House of Representatives, and I sure do not know when it is going to finally work its way through the Senate. It is going to get a lot of massaging from the first one who ran it up the flagpole to the last person who votes for it. We know it's only the product of a word processor. It is something that is going to have a lot of changes I believe before it gets to us. Then it will have some more.

I am one of those. I believe we should leave some incentives in the tax system, try to accomplish some economic objectives in our country, some social objectives for our country.

Mr. President, what you have seen in these corporations is an overuse of the tax preferences. You see the situation where the individual parts of our tax system add up to an unjust whole, and you create a perception of unfairness in the system. That perception is right. Therefore, this kind of a minimum tax is something that I think we should do and we should move forward with it.

I can understand a chief executive of a corporation who says, "I must do everything I can to avoid taxes." It is our fault that we have such a tax system and that we have not taken the kind of steps that we have to take to try to close that.

I have looked at that list of over 250 corporations that were checked and I have seen over half of them had not paid any tax at all in the last 3 years.

So it is obvious that we have to move forward, and I am going to support the resolution of the Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the Finance Committee.

This resolution calls for imposing a minimum tax and reducing individual tax rates with the revenues we raise. Another worthy use of the revenue would be to reduce the deficit. The chairman of the Finance Committee has assured us that that is one of the options that will be considered.

I frankly do not think this resolution goes far enough, but I do think it is a step in the right direction and I hope we will pass it tonight.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am going to support the pending resolution for a number of reasons:

First of all, it finally expresses the sense of, I hope, a majority of this Senate, that we have to make sure that people who use the deductions and shelters in our tax system still when they are all done taking their deductions, all done taking their shelters, pay something in Federal income taxes.

That is the first half of this resolution. I am talking about corporations and individuals. I am all for it and I congratulate the chairman of the Finance Committee for moving in this direction.

For many of us this addresses the fairness aspect of the tax simplification movement. For others it will not. For others there is still a long distance to go, but for some of us a minimum tax on corporations and individuals is a way of addressing the fairness element of the tax simplification movement.

The second half of this resolution troubles me a little bit for the reasons that the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Ohio have mentioned, but this resolution is not amendable, it is not divisible, and so what we are left with is a resolution in the first half of which we agree with and the second half of which is not as flexible as we like except that our friend from Oregon said it is perfectly consistent to vote for this resolution and later on argue that the proceeds of the minimum tax be applied to deficit reduction. It is that legislative history that I am relying on, and I think others will rely on, in voting for this resolution.

So, Mr. President, I will vote for the sense of the Senate resolution in support of the enactment of an effective minimum tax because it is long overdue that we make sure that profitable corporations and wealthy individuals pay their fair share in taxes. I am pleased that the chairman of the Finance Committee indicated to me in the debate on this resolution that support of this resolution is in no way inconsistent with later arguing for the revenues generated by this tax to be used for deficit reduction. Under the parliamentary situation, this resolution is not subject to amendment. But I accept the words of the chairman of the Finance Committee that how the revenues generated by this tax will be used is a battle for another day.

It is appropriate for some of the revenues generated by a more effective minimum tax to be used at least in part for deficit reduction because it is essential for a budget package of shared sacrifice. A more effective minimum tax may be the only way for some profitable corporations and wealthy individuals to share in the burden of deficit reduction. Further, it is impossible to contemplate asking some of the most vulnerable members of our society to tighten their belts unless we also make sure that wealthy individuals and profitable corporations who are not paying anything in taxes to pay at least a minimum amount.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I think my colleagues should understand what they are doing when they vote for this resolution.

They are voting for three things. First is they are voting to indicate their support for a minimum tax.

The second thing is that they are indicating that they want the money to be used to reduce other taxes, not to reduce the deficit.

But the third thing, and the one that I do not think has been mentioned, has to do with the language of the resolution, and if I am stating it incorrectly, I hope that the author of the resolution will correct me.

But if you will note in lines 4, 5, and 6, it says, "providing for the payment of minimum taxes by corporations and individuals," and this is the relevent language, "on the broadest feasible definition of income."

I believe that the chairman of the Finance Committee knew full well what were his intentions when he included that language because, if I understand it correctly, the "broadest feasible definition of income" would mean taxing Social Security, taxing pensions, taxing life insurance—that is an item we see so many TV ads about—taxing medical insurance payments, taxing disability payments, taxing health and welfare benefits, taxing unemployment compensation, and a host of other items.

That is the only reason that I could understand the language "on the broadest feasible definition of income."

And, as you well know, we have already moved to the point of taxing indirectly Social Security income and we have already moved with respect to the matter of taxing tax-exempt bond income, and if the chairman of the Finance Committee thinks I am wrong in interpreting the language this way and misrepresenting the facts to my colleagues in the Senate, then I would appreciate his correcting me, but I see no other way that that language can be interpreted other than the way the Senator from Ohio has interpreted it.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I am amused by the interpretation by my good friend from Ohio. That reminds me of a great book. The author, Shakespeare, I am sure, though he had a good line. But someone tried to read in what Shakespeare said about his mother when he wrote it.

My good friend from Ohio knows what this means. It does not intend to reach the poor on Social Security by taxing their income or those who have a pension from their company of $150, $200 a month in addition to Social Security.

It is meant to get at those, principally the wealthy, who make legitimate deductions that are allowed by law and somehow arrange to have no taxable income. They, by and large, are not cheats, they are not evading the law. They are taking advantage of the law. And all this resolution says is we are going to change the law so that those wealthy and privileged individuals and corporations can no longer take advantage of it.

THE MINIMUM TAX AMENDMENT

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I must respectfully oppose the amendment of Senator PACKWOOD regarding a sense of the Senate resolution on minimum taxes. Although in principle I support the enactment of a revised and workable minimum tax for both corporations and individuals, nevertheless I plan to vote against this amendment.

Any minimum tax proposal should simply be a straightforward fix of the current minimum tax provisions of the Tax Code. There is no reason to require that such a repair job on the Tax Code be "revenue neutral."

I have introduced, with Senator MOYNIHAN, a minimum tax proposal for both individuals and corporations. In my statement for introduction, I cited some of the same statistics which Senator PACKWOOD cited tonight about the corporations and wealthy individuals with substantial income who are currently able to legally avoid paying taxes. These individuals and corporations can do this because the current minimum taxes in the Tax Code are not working. These provisions should be fixed.

Fixing the minimum tax provisions of the Tax Code is analogous to fixing a leaky roof of your house, while waiting and planning to do a complete renovation. We need to completely reform our Tax Code, and I am looking forward to working with the President when he submits his proposal later this month, and to working with the chairman of the Finance Committee, who stated tonight that he plans to do everything he can to get a tax reform bill passed by the end of this year. However, in the meantime we cannot ignore the leaky roof.

Enacting a minimum tax should not divert our energy from true tax reform. It is simply necessary maintenance. Senator PACKWOOD's proposal would confuse tax reform with necessary repair of the Tax Code. He proposes to enact a minimum tax on corporations and individuals and then use the revenues raised to reduce the tax rates for individuals. Reducing the tax rates and broadening the tax base are the key components of tax reform. Interjecting rate reduction into the process of enacting a workable minimum tax is inappropriate and possibly counterproductive because it steals some of the themes and thus the thunder of real tax reform.

In addition, any additional revenue that will be raised by fixing the current minimum tax provisions of the Code should be used to reduce the Federal deficit. Certainly we are all aware of the agony of the past few weeks as we struggle to cut spending programs to reduce this deficit. It simply makes no sense to refuse to apply the revenues that might be raised from fixing the existing provisions in the Tax Code to reducing the deficit, especially since the minimum tax is directed precisely at wealthy corporations and individuals not now making even a minimum contribution to deficit reduction.

I support the adoption of minimum tax, but not in the form proposed by Senator PACKWOOD tonight. In the context of the current budget crisis and the beginning debate on tax reform, it is not necessary or appropriate to require that a minimum tax proposal be "revenue neutral."

Mr. DOMENICI. Parliamentary inquiry. How much time do we have remaining on the amendment on each side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader's time has expired, and the Senator from Oregon has 3 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield myself 5 minutes off the resolution.

Does the Senator know if any other Senators desire to speak in favor of the proposal? I do not think we have many more on our side who desire to speak in favor of the amendment.

I kind of wish the Senator from Arkansas was here so I could address my remarks to his remarks, but in his absence I will try my best.

Frankly, I hope the distinguished Senator from Arkansas knows a lot more about the Tax Code than he knows about the budget because obviously the statements he has made about the budget here do not make any sense. So I truly hope that he knows what he said about taxes, because if they are both about the same dimension and level of accuracy, then I do not know what we heard.

We talk a lot about reducing this deficit. Now somebody gets up and says that the deficit reduction package—I do not know if it was the President's of 3 months ago or the one here, but obviously it is not enough. Well, let me tell you, I have not heard very many people that want to support that much. It is not $52 billion. The one that we have up there is $295 billion over 3 years. Now maybe it is not enough.

I will tell you right now, if we can get 51 Senators that want to get in a room and say, "We are ready to cut the expenditures of this Government $295 billion," then let us talk about what the distinguished Senator is talking about—about making someone's day. Because he is right. After we made $295 billion, we have got some deficit left. But I tell you, it is $295 billion less than we would have had, plus a whole bunch of interest we will save that we would have spent. So we ought to start with that.

If it is not enough, then why do we not get a lot of people to come up and say, "We sign up for $295 billion worth of savings," and let us put a little group together and say, "It is not enough." Then let us look at what we will do. I am not committing to anybody. But maybe I would look at taxes then. The problem is that nobody is willing to say, even though it is not enough, if it is not, that they will not even do that much. They want to start talking about taxes immediately.

I will tell you the best information I have to give you. If you put that package in place that is up there at the desk, $295 billion, 3 years from now at the end of the fiscal year, I say to my good friend from Florida, who understands estimates, we will have a deficit of between $98 billion and $147 billion. And I cannot tell you which one is right, but I can tell you it is $295 billion plus interest savings less than it is going to be.

And why can I not tell you whether it is 98 or 147? It is because I cannot predict for you what the inflation rate 3 years from now is going to be, what the unemployment rate 3 years from now is going to be, or what the interest rate 3 years from now is going to be.

But what I can tell you is that all of those are going to be better if you cut $295 billion than otherwise. And where do I get those two numbers? No argument on numbers from CBO. They just say, "We are not sure the interest rate is going to be that low 3 years from now, and we are not sure the inflation rate is going to be that low or the unemployment rate, and we chose a more optimistic set of economic assumptions."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield myself 3 more minutes.

The facts are, there are program changes mandated to the Finance Committee and mandated to every other committee with freezes that take $295 billion out of the expenditure side that would otherwise be there.

Now, having said that, we can have an argument about whose day we want to make with more taxes. But I want to tell you why I am going to support this resolution. There are a lot of people in this Chamber that want this tax bill, the tax bill that might flow from this resolution, to be passed. And they are standing up telling Americans, "We want to pay the deficit with it. We want to pay for programs of the national Government."

I do not want to. Do you know why I do not want to? Because there are millions of U.S. citizens that are in poverty that are paying taxes—millions of Americans in poverty that are paying taxes.

When we changed the cost of living on Social Security everybody ran down here and said, "There are 500,000 people going to drop $5 below the line of poverty."

I have got the most recent one here, the poverty level in the United States. In 1977, people in poverty paid zero taxes. Do you know what the poverty mass, all those millions in poverty pay today? 11.7 percent of their income they pay in Federal income taxes. Do you know how much it will cost to take them off the rolls where they ought to be?

Why should we be inventing programs here to try to help the working poor? We go through all kinds of gyrations—Will it help them? Will it not help them?"—when we are taxing them. Why do we not stop taxing them first before we decide to give them a little subsidy here? Do you know what it is going to cost, for those on the Finance Committee, to take them off? $16 billion in taxes.

So I am voting for this because if something like this passes, I want the first $16 billion to take the poor people off the tax roles. And I do not want to use that $16 billion to pay for Amtrak; I do not want to use it to pay for Job Corps; I do not want to use it to pay for EDA; and I do not want to use it to pay for the Appalachian Regional Commission, none of which, in my opinion, are even one-tenth as important as taking millions of poor people off the tax roles.

Now you have a choice here. Do you want to cut programs and have tax reform and use the tax reform money to help poor people not pay taxes or do you want to fool them?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield myself 2 more minutes.

Or do you want to fool them, and do you want to say, "We are going to take that tax and keep all these programs here that you all think are helping you, and we are going to leave all those poor people on the tax rolls paying taxes"?

I can tell you a lot more about how we got in this mess. Some think it has been a tax hemorrhage. I can tell you about that, too.

In fact, I have a table here. I ask unanimous consent that the record level of taxes paid by the American people from 1966 through 1985 be printed in the RECORD. If you will look at it, you will find that you are paying taxes at just about the average level that you paid before the hemorrhage occurred, whenever it occurred.

The being no objection, the table was order to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

	Revenues as a percentage of GNP	Spending as a percentage of GNP
1966	18.1	18.6
1967	19.1	20.3
1968	18.4	21.4

[1] Projected.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I have decided to support this amendment offered by Mr. PACKWOOD because of the assurance given on the floor by the author in colloquies with Senator LEVIN that support of this resolution is not inconsistent with later arguing that some or all of the revenues generated by this minimum tax would be used for deficit reduction.

I also want it understood that I would only favor revenue increases if they are part of a total deficit reduction package that contains more spending cuts than it does revenue changes. I also strongly believe that any revenue increases should be used to either reduce the deficit or reduce taxes and not to fuel spending increases.

I do believe that a minimum tax also offers a positive alternative to some recent Treasury Department proposals to change the Tax Code in ways that would blunt necessary incentives for saving and investment and necessary soundly beneficial activities by the private sector.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute off the resolution to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee a question. I would like to ask him whether it is clearly his intent in this measure, as it is construed or constructed later on by the Finance Committee, that this is in no way to be construed as or constructed in that process as a new tax, but rather it is his intent solely, as I believe was hinted at in the colloquy with the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, that it is exclusively the making more fair of an existing tax. Is that a correct interpretation?

Mr. PACKWOOD. No, that is not correct interpretation. For those who are paying no tax now, for those privileged few who manage to escape taxation, there would be a new tax on them.

I do not want to mislead my colleague from Massachusetts. The moneys will be used to relieve the taxes on the poor and to cut taxes generally. That is the thrust of the resolution. It is revenue neutral and it is not a substitute for tax reform.

There have been some stories, and I think some people—I have not noticed it in this body yet, but some others—allegedly want a minimum tax, and I think are using it as a smoke screen to avoid tax reform. That is not my intention.

Mr. KERRY. I wonder if I might explore that with the distinguished Senator.

First, a new tax is a tax—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 1 minute has expired.

Mr. CRANSTON. I yield 1 additional minute off the resolution.

Mr. KERRY. Thank you very much.

A new tax is a tax that has not existed previously. A corporate tax is in existence. A personal income tax is in existence. If some individuals are not paying those taxes, they are not paying them because of various deductions and loopholes that may exist. I believe the distinguished Senator intends to close those loopholes and therefore, yes, the individual may wind up paying a tax but it is not the creation of a new tax on the books. It is a payment of a tax that they should have in fact been paying and insomuch as it is that, it is your intention that it is not a new tax?

Mr. PACKWOOD. No. Again I do not think my good friend phrases it correctly. When we get to tax reform—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's minute has expired.

Mr. CRANSTON. I yield the chairman of the Finance Committee 1 additional minute.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I thank my good friend from California.

I hope we close a lot of loopholes when we get to tax reform. But this minimum tax could go into effect if we had no tax bill. We simply say even if you had large tax deductions and you come down to no taxable income, and pay no tax, we would still say you are going to pay some tax whether or not we ever change the deduction. I hope we do. I hope we have tax reform but this resolution stands on its own whether we do or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has 2 minutes left on the amendment.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, may I have 1 minute?

Mr. PACKWOOD. One minute to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, the point I think that should be made here—and I heard my distinguished friend from Ohio make the point—about corporations who do not pay taxes and that everyone ought to recognize that any corporate tax does one of two things: It either passes the tax on to the consumers, or it taxes the means of production. If you tax the means of production too hard, then you cause more unemployment, and that does not help the people in the lower income group. On the other side of it, to the extent that those taxes are passed forward to the consumers, it is very regressive. The corporate tax is one of the most regressive taxes in our entire system. I think everybody ought to make it very clear here that when they are passing a minimum corporate tax, they are passing a regressive tax on the working or in some cases the non-working consumers who have to buy the products that those corporations pass on, and then they collect the taxes and send it in to the Government. I think that is the problem that is being missed here in this debate entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has 2 minutes. Does he yield back his time?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, as modified. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMSPON. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DURENBERGER] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] is absent due to illness.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. EAGLETON] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDREWS). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 79, nays 17, as follows:

So the amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the majority leader seek recognition?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me suggest that we have about a 5-minute quorum call. Then I will come back and I think give my colleagues an announcement whether or not there is going to be another amendment this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the majority leader suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. DOLE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate that I have been conferring with the distinguished manager of the bill, Senator DOMENICI, and other Members on this side to see what amendment we might proceed with tonight.

What I would like to do, if it meets with the approval of my colleagues, is to lay down an amendment, not have any vote tonight, come in quite early in the morning, say 8:30 for special orders, probably have a vote by 10:30 or 11 on the amendment, then hopefully call a couple other amendments up tomorrow, vote on those and hopefully leave at some reasonable time in the afternoon. So there would not be any additional votes this evening. There is an amendment on that side. We have looked at a couple of possibilities. But I think if there is no objection, I would like to come in at 8:30.

ORDERS FOR FRIDAY, MAY 3, 1985

Could I obtain unanimous consent for that now to come in at 8:30 a.m. on Friday, May 3? And also, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be a special order in favor of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, Senator PROXMIRE, not to exceed 15 minutes. Then I would ask unanimous consent that there be a period for transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 9 a.m. with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the requests of the majority leader are granted.

Mr. DOLE. Then we would be back on Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 at 9 o'clock, and hopefully we would be able to have a vote by 10:30, 11, 11:30, maybe, at the latest, noon, and hopefully a couple other votes.

We have amendments on this side. I understand the distinguished minority leader is working on a number of amendments. He may or may not be prepared tomorrow. But we have conferred and we expect to have votes on Monday. I have been asked that on this side and the answer is yes. I think the minority leader will concur in that.

Mr. BYRD. Yes, Mr. President. As I have indicated to the distinguished majority leader, possibly if we have votes on Monday—I would anticipate that we would—but if we could have an understanding that they would not occur maybe before 3 or 4 o'clock.

Mr. DOLE. I indicated earlier probably not before 2 o'clock, and I am certainly willing to extend that to 3 o'clock. I would also have to suggest we might be in a little later that evening, Monday evening, until 7 or 8 or 9 o'clock.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may I ask the majority leader, he indicated earlier that on Tuesday evening next there would be a function which Members on his side would want to attend and that we would probably have no votes after——

Mr. DOLE. I would say after 4 o'clock. Maybe debate after that, but no votes.

Mr. BYRD. Then on Wednesday evening, if we could have a similar understanding to accommodate a function on this side that we would like to attend—we would be happy to have the distinguished majority leader attend and others on his side—could we have that understanding that on both of those evenings we not go late?

Mr. DOLE. I think it is fair if we are going to ask for that consideration on Tuesday. It is not an event that I have been invited to attend, but the Vice President is going in my place. But in any event, I think it would be about the same time or a little later.

Mr. BYRD. Yes, about the same time.

Mr. DOLE. But would the minority leader agree that we ought to finish this bill next week?

Mr. BYRD. Yes. We have about 21 hours left, 20 or some such. I should think that we ought to try to finish by midweek.

Mr. DOLE. One suggestion has been brought to my attention, which is probably a little late, that we might agree to reduce the time tomorrow, proportionate time, and lay down an amendment and take it up on Monday. Maybe it is a little late to get into that, because several Members have changed their plans.

But we will accommodate the minority leader on Wednesday. We had hoped to go late on Wednesday, but we will try to work that out.

We will come in early next Tuesday and Wednesday of next week. So if there is no objection, and there has been none, to the request, I will yield the floor to the distinguished Senator from Oregon to lay down the amendment and then we will go out.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, this is an amendment offered for myself, Senator CHAFEE, Senator DURENBERGER, and Senator HEINZ relating to Medicare and Medicaid as a mark of $16.3 billion in Medicare and $1.2 billion in Medicaid for a total of $17.5 billion.

It eliminates the very objectionable Medicaid cap that has disturbed so many State officials. In Medicare, it make some slight changes in part B deductibles and other reductions in fairness from the initial suggestions of both the Budget Committee and the budget proposal that was initially before us.

Beyond that, I do not think there is much need for any further explanation. I can answer most of the questions about it tomorrow for any of those who are interested.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 1052. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to require the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to carry out demonstration projects to furnish chiropractic services to certain veterans and to evaluate the cost effectiveness of furnishing such services to such veterans; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VETERANS' CHIROPRACTIC SERVICES DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS ACT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to authorize the Veterans' Administration to conduct demonstration projects for the purposes of providing chiropractic services to eligible veterans and evaluating the therapeutic benefits and cost-effectiveness of such services. I am pleased that Senator DECONCINI has joined as an original cosponsor of this measure.

Current law authorizes the Veterans' Administration to provide chiropractic services to veterans, and Veterans' Administration physicians may, on a case-by-case basis and at the expense of the VA, refer an eligible veteran to a private chiropractor for treatment. However, despite this authority, few veterans have actually been referred to private chiropractors by VA physicians.

Mr. President, chiropractic treatment has become a recognized and effective means of treating certain physical impairments and disorders. In virtually all other areas of the Federal health care delivery system, Congress has recognized the important role of chiropractic care. Moreover, a number of States also include chiropractic services under their medical assistance programs. It is my strong belief that our Nation's veterans deserve the same access to medical treatment, including chiropractic treatment, as that available to recipients of other Federal and State health care programs.

At this point, it is appropriate to list some of the programs on the Federal level which authorize chiropractic services. The provision of chiropractic services is authorized for eligible persons under the Medicare and Medicaid Programs. Chiropractic services are provided to Federal employees under several health plans offered through the Federal Employee Health Benefit Program. Federal employees have chiropractic coverage under the Federal Employee Workers' Compensation Program. Chiropractic health services are included in the Railroad Retirement Act. Last year, with passage of the Department of Defense Authorization Act of 1985, Public Law 98-525, Congress authorized the Secretary of Defense to conduct demonstration projects for the purpose of evaluating the cost-effectiveness of chiropractic services under the CHAMPUS Program.

Mr. President, it is time that the policy and practice of the Veterans' Administration be brought in conformity with these programs. The chiropractic patient population today in the United States is estimated to be between 10 and 20 million. Our Nation has some 28 million veterans, and there is no doubt that a substantial number of our veterans who receive medical care at Veterans' Administration facilities are either actual or potential chiropractic patients.

Mr. President, the legislation which I propose today would authorize the Veterans' Administration to conduct no less than five demonstration projects in five different geographical regions of the country to provide chiropractic services to eligible veterans. In the conduct of these demonstration projects, the VA would enter into cooperative agreements with no less than five chiropractic colleges to coordinate the provision of chiropractic services to veterans and perform clinical research and data collection regarding the therapeutic benefits and cost-effectiveness of such services.

Under the provisions of my bill, an eligible veteran may receive no more than $600 in chiropractic services in any 12-month period, and the Administrator would be authorized to prescribe a limit on the amount payable to any chiropractic college in any fiscal year under a cooperative agreement. In addition, total expenditures for chiropractic services under the demonstration projects would be limited to $2,000,000 in any fiscal year. It is intended that the demonstration projects be funded from appropriations for medical and prosthetic research and development.

Mr. President, although the House of Representatives has failed on three previous occasions to accept Senate-passed legislation authorizing the establishment of a pilot program of chiropractic services for veterans—legislation which I introduced—it has joined the Senate in strongly urging the Veterans' Administration to re-evaluate its position and use existing authority to provide chiropractic services in appropriate cases as part of the medical care afforded to veterans. This message has been virtually ignored by the Veterans' Administration. I, therefore, urge Congress to send a stronger message to the Veterans' Administration on this matter by favorably considering this legislation.

By Mr. MATSUNAGA (for himself, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. GORTON, Mr. EVANS, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. KERRY, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. DENTON, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. HART, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. EXON, Mr. SIMON, Mr. BRADLEY, and Mr. LAUTENBERG):

S. 1053. A bill to accept the findings and to implement the recommendations of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

(The remarks of Mr. MATSUNAGA and other Senators, and the text of the legislation appear earlier in today's RECORD.)

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself, Mr. GLENN, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. COHEN, Mr. CHILES, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. DIXON, and Mr. PROXMIRE):

S. 1054. A bill to amend the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 to remove the maximum age limitation applicable to employees who are protected under such act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

AGE DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, President Reagan announced his support for an end to mandatory retirement nearly 3 years ago. Today, I am again introducing legislation to fulfill this long-deferred goal: The prohibition of mandatory retirement based solely on age. I am pleased that Senator GLENN, the ranking minority member of the Aging Committee and Senators ANDREWS, COHEN, HUMPHREY, BURDICK, CHILES, CRANSTON, DIXON, and PROXMIRE join with me in sponsoring this bill. A similar bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman CLAUDE PEPPER.

Currently, there are 1.2 million Americans age 70 and over in our work force. Many of these people want to continue working—sometimes for reasons of self-fulfillment, but more often for reasons of economic necessity. Federal law now deprives these people of the same guarantees of equal opportunity in employment that other citizens enjoy. They are deprived of this protection not on the basis of who they are and what they can do, but solely on the basis of their age. This seems to me the rankest form of discrimination, and we should no longer tolerate it in Federal law.

In 1978, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act was amended to eliminate mandatory retirement for nearly all Federal workers and to increase to 70 the age at which non-Federal workers could be forcibly retired. This bill will abolish that age 70 cap and reverse a policy that implicitly sanctions arbitrary discrimination against working men and women over the age of 70. While this is a simple change in the law, it will make an enormous difference in the lives of those who will soon face the devastating effects of age discrimination.

Admittedly, Mr. President, the recent economic slowdown created a difficult climate for the full utilization of older workers. There has been a tendency to fall back on traditional retirement and separation procedures in order to reduce the size of a firm's work force. But the demographic projections are quite different for the near future. We need to look beyond the immediate situation and prepare for the inevitable work force changes that will occur with complete recovery and with time. Our Nation will need these productive older workers. As you are aware, Mr. President, the age distribution of the population will be shifting dramatically over the coming decades. The younger working-age population—ages 16-44—has ceased its rapid growth and between now and the year 1995, will actually show marked declines. What this means is that our standard of living is threatened due to possible future labor shortages unless we as a nation continue to increase the size of our work force. And since everyone who will be a younger worker during the next 20 years has already been born, we know that the only way that we will be able to grow and prosper is if able bodied, productive older workers, who are today in their late forties or fifties or even early sixties, have the opportunity and incentive to continue working. The behavior of this future group of older workers will be vital to our continued economic growth.

We also need to encourage older people to remain productive to lessen the strains on our retirement income programs. If those now forced to retire were working, the overall obligation of the Social Security trust fund would be decreased, and the number contributing would increase. Recent figures from the Social Security Administration estimate the savings to the OASDI trust funds from prohibiting compulsory retirement at $0.7 billion annually by the year 2000 and $4 billion annually by the year 2020.

But the importance of abolishing the age 70 limit for ADEA protection lies not only in the positive shifts in behavior it will bring about. In fact, such shifts will be relatively minor. Persons over age 70 constitute just 1.2 percent of our 105 million person work force. Lifting the age cap will have a negligible impact on that figure. Rather, the importance of removing age 70 is its message to present and future older workers: You are to be employed on the basis of your capability, not on the basis of your birth date.

Mr. President, the problems associated with age discrimination are not new to the Congress. The first ADEA bill, enacted in 1967, stemmed from the Congress' determination that age discrimination, like discrimination based upon race, religion, or sex, is inherently contrary to the principle of individual merit. The original act was designed to protect workers between the ages of 40 and 65. In 1978, the age for protection was raised to 70. At that time, it was agreed that age 70 would be used until the Department of Labor conduct a study on the impact of totally eliminating mandatory retirement. The results of that study indicate beyond all doubt that raising the permissible mandatory retirement age to 70 has had no significant negative economic or social impact. It further concludes that eliminating mandatory retirement entirely would not produce any work force dislocations. These conclusions pave the way for those of us in the Congress to remove the most visible symbol of age discrimination in the work place.

Public opinion in this country clearly supports the bill we are now introducing. A recent Harris poll found that by a 9-to-1 margin, a majority of all ages feel that "nobody should be forced to retire because of age." By another lopsided margin, three-quarters of all adults are convinced that "most employers discriminate against older people and make it difficult for them to find work." The poll also found that 3 out of 4 retirees wish they had some form of employment after retirement. Taken together, the Department of Labor study and the survey findings show that mandatory retirement remains an unnecessary and unjustified obstacle to older workers and, indeed, an abridgement of their right to remain contributors to the American economy.

Mr. President, unlike the measure I introduced in the 98th Congress, this bill does not contain a controversial, albeit temporary exemption for tenured professors of colleges and universities. I am aware of the special complications involving academic tenure and of the concern that uncapping the retirement age for tenured professors might result in reducing the number of openings for new faculty members. I am aware also that the tenure system, which has been a critical factor in ensuring academic freedom, creates special circumstances regarding retirement, and I am sympathetic to these concerns. The fact that in this legislation we have elected to omit the exemption at this time should not be viewed as prejudicial, in any way, to a final decision on how to address this concern.

I am also mindful of the fact that during the 1980's the traditional college-age population has decreased. However, enrollment levels are expected to be maintained during the late 1980's as the increased enrollment of older students offsets the enrollment declines of younger students. In addition, the national birthrate began to climb once again in 1977. The National Education Association states that there are 54,000 more elementary schoolchildren in the Nation's classrooms, the first noticeable increase in 14 years. And this growth will continue into the 1990's, according to the National Center for Education Statistics. Thus baby boomlet may not be as big or as long as the baby boom after World War II, but it will help to expend student enrollment, and should then create demand for college professors of all ages.

Mr. President, passage of this mandatory retirement bill will not end age discrimination. This form of discrimination has persisted in this country on the basis of misconceptions concerning the aging process and unfounded stereotypes about older people. But with this new legislation we can begin to reeducate the American public, and especially employers, about the vast reservoir of talent and expertise that older Americans have to offer to the social and economic development of our society.

Some of the legal barriers to continued employment are ironically part of the very law that is supposed to help and protect older workers. The ADEA allows employers to refuse to hire and also to terminate older workers on the basis of age if age constitutes so-called bona fide occupational qualification needed for the conduct of a business. Thus, workers such as police officers, firefighters, pilots, and incumbents in other jobs that often involve stress or relate to public safety are often refused jobs or forced to retire early simply on the basis of age. I realize Mr. President, that these matters are complicated and that physical strength to meet rigorous job demands may well ebb as a worker grows older. But the history of litigation under this exception indicates that many employers are attempting to utilized it as a means to refuse employment to older workers.

These legal barriers are serious problems that need close examination and scrutiny. But the most serious barrier and the most insidious—is simple lack of choice. Our present system allows for Government regulation of something our Founding Fathers placed the highest value on: Individual citizen choice. Our public and private employment policies are geared to either full-time work or full-time retirement. They deliminate the very choice that appears to most older workers: Part-time employment. This bill will return to business and individual citizens the freedom of choice about when to retire.

On summary, the continued use of mandatory retirement policies is both morally unsupportable and contrary to the economic interests of employers, employees, and the American public. It is bad for workers, bad for business, and bad for the economy. Incalculable human talent—and spirit—has been wasted as able workers have been forced in premature idleness. Eliminating this type of discrimination will signal our recognition of the value of older workers in the workplace and will signal our intention to reject all barriers to their full participation.

I ask that the text of the bill appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1054

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Age Discrimination in Employment Amendments of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 12 of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 (29 U.S.C. 631-634) is amended—

(2) in subsection (c)(1) by striking out "but not 70 years of age,".

SEC. 3. The amendments made by section 2 of this Act shall take effect on January 1, 1986, except that with respect to any employee who is subject to a collective bargaining agreement—

(1) which is in effect on March 14, 1985,

(2) which terminates after January 1, 1986,

(3) any provision of which was entered into by a labor organization (as defined by section 6(d)(4) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 206(d)(4)), and

(4) which contains any provision that would be superseded by such amendments, but for the operation of this section, such amendments shall not apply until the termination of such collective-bargaining agreement or January 1, 1989, whichever occurs first.●

PROHIBITING MANDATORY RETIREMENT

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am please to join in cosponsoring the legislation, S. 1054, being introduced today by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ], chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Aging and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN], the ranking minority member of that committee. This legislation would abolish mandatory retirement for the vast majority of American workers by amending the Federal Age Discrimination in Employment Act [ADEA] to remove the provision in current law that denies the protections of that act to individuals 70 years old or older.

Mr. President, I am a long-time and strong advocate of abolishing mandatory retirement. On the first day of this Congress, I introduced legislation, S. 2, the proposed "Older Americans Employment Opportunities Act of 1985," which included, among a number of other proposals aimed at increasing opportunities for older Americans to stay in the work force if they so desired, provisions to remove the age 70 ceiling from the ADEA in order to abolish mandatory retirement.

During the 97th Congress, I also cosponsored legislation, S. 2617, proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania which would have removed the age 70 ceiling. Unfortunately, I was unable to join as a cosponsor of a subsequent bill which the Senator from Pennsylvania introduced during the last Congress, S. 832, because the version introduced in the 98th Congress included provisions which I could not support which would have resulted in excluding a certain category of workers—tenured college professors—from the full protection of ADEA. Accordingly, in the 98th Congress, I introduced two bills—S. 1751 and an earlier version of S. 2—which would have prohibited mandatory retirement for all employees covered by the ADEA.

I am particularly delighted therefore that the legislation being introduced today by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Ohio would not create an exception which would allow universities or colleges to force certain employees to retire at an arbitrary age. My own bill, S. 2, would go a step farther and eliminate as well the exemption in existing law that allows companies to force into retirement employees with certain pension rights. Nonetheless, I am pleased that the chairman and the ranking Democratic member of the Senate Aging Committee share my conviction that we should not be creating any new exclusion of any workers from the full protection of the ADEA and have eliminated the exemption for tenured faculty members in the version of the legislation that they are introducing in the 99th Congress.

NEED TO ELIMINATE MANDATORY RETIREMENT FOR ALL WORKERS

Mr. President, mandatory retirement should be abolished. Forcing older workers out of their jobs at some arbitrary age is an archaic, discriminatory, and unreasonable policy. It robs society of the contribution and productivity of an increasingly important segment of our work force, and it robs these individuals of the dignity and self-sufficiency which comes from working. In 1978, we began to deal with the issue of mandatory retirement by abolishing it for Federal workers and by raising the age from 65 to 70 for most other workers. I supported the 1978 legislation as an interim step toward total abolition of mandatory retirement, and I led the Senate floor fight against excluding any category of worker from protection. Although those efforts were not entirely successful, the exception for tenured faculty members expired on July 1, 1982. Thus today, these employees enjoy the same protection against mandatory retirement as do millions of other workers. That is the way the law should remain.

Mr. President, at the time the 1978 legislation passed, many opponents argued that eliminating mandatory retirement would result in a loss of job opportunities for younger workers, for women, and for minorities. The 1978 law directed the Department of Labor to conduct a study to determine the impact on these categories of workers of raising the mandatory retirement age from 65 to 70 and of abolishing it altogether. That report, released in final form in 1983, found those allegations to be without any basis in fact. It concluded that there was no significant job slot competition between older workers likely to continue in the work force and those other categories of workers. The 1981 interim report of the Department of Labor calculated that the additional over-65 workers would be potential competitors of less than one-quarter of 1 percent of all full-time workers aged 16 to 24; of less than one-half of 1 percent of all black workers aged 16 to 59; and of about one-tenth of 1 percent of all full-time female workers aged 16 to 59.

Like many of the myths that surround age discrimination, the allegation that we must treat older workers unfairly in order to protect other categories of workers is simply untrue. Injustice seldom breeds justice, and here the facts are totally unsupportive of perpetuating age discrimination because of some mistaken notion about the needs of other workers.

NO JUSTIFICATION FOR EXEMPTIONS FROM PROTECTION

Mr. President, there is simply no basis for continuing to deprive older Americans of the right to continue to work if they want to. Unreasonable discrimination on the basis of age is just as invidious and unfair as discrimination based on race or sex or religion or national origin. It has no place in our society. Every worker ought to have the right to be judged on the basis of his or her abilities, and not because they have reached some arbitrary age. The issue is one of basic civil rights and fairness.

That is why I have felt so strongly that we should not be providing exceptions for particular categories of workers. If it is wrong to force individuals, without regard to their individual competency, to retire at a set age then there is no justification for carving out particular segments of the workforce where such invidious discrimination can be practiced. The law clearly does not limit any employer's ability to discharge any employee, regardless of age, who cannot adequately perform his or her duties. That ought to be the standard in every occupational field, not some arbitrary factor, whether it be age, race, disability, or some other form of bias.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, the time is long passed for Congress to abolish once and for all its sanctioning of mandatory retirement policies. Extending the protections of the ADEA to workers over age 70 will accomplish that goal. Mandatory retirement, like other forms of unfair treatment, is a practice that must be ended.

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, as the ranking Democratic member of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, I am pleased to join my colleagues in introducing this legislation to extend the protections of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act to persons age 70 and over. With passage of this legislation, workers will not be forced to retire solely because of their birthdate. This legislation will be significant for many older persons who want to continue working, without having an adverse impact on employers or other segments of the labor force.

The Age Discrimination in Employment Act [ADEA] prohibits discrimination in employment because of age in such matters as hiring, job retention, compensation, and other terms, conditions, and privileges of employment. The ADEA protects workers from age 40 to 70 from discrimination by most employers of 20 or more persons—including State and local governments—employment agencies, and labor organizations—with 25 or more members. Federal Government employees are protected from age 40, without any upper age limit. The original 1967 act protected workers aged 40 to 65. I supported legislation in 1978 which raised the upper age limit from 65 to 70. The legislation we are introducing today lifts this age 70 cap in the ADEA to protect all older workers from employment discrimination based on age.

Currently, there are 1.2 million Americans over the age of 70 in our work force. Many of these people want to continue working—sometimes for reasons of self-fulfillment, and often for reasons of economic necessity. Federal law now deprives these people, solely on the basis of their age, of the same guarantees of equal opportunity in employment that other citizens enjoy. It is inequitable to judge a person's qualifications for a job solely on the basis of age, without regard to fitness for a job. In fact, chronological age alone is a poor indicator of ability to perform a job. Research shows that older workers can be equal or superior to younger workers in the areas of quality and quantity of work, dependability, judgment, human relations, attendance, and on-the-job safety. Nine out of ten employers in a 1981 study by Mercer, Inc., stated that older workers perform as well on the job as younger workers and that older workers are more committed to company objectives than younger workers.

Our Nation needs the contributions of these productive older workers. The bulk of our current work force is the group of younger workers aged 16 to 44, but this group will peak in numbers around 1990 and then begin to decline. In order to sustain economic growth and productivity, we must look to the pool of middle-aged and older persons. We should allow them to compete in the work force in a fair position without discrimination.

As part of the 1978 amendments to the ADEA, Congress required the Department of Labor to study the effects of raising the mandatory retirement age from 65 to 70, and the feasibility of eliminating the age 70 cap altogether. The Labor Department's 4-year study shows that abolishing the mandatory retirement age would have no significant negative impact on our Nation's work force or employers. The Labor Department's findings include the following:

Employers have not experienced major administrative difficulties or increased costs with mandatory retirement at age 70, and do not anticipate major changes in retirement patterns if mandatory retirement is eliminated.

Abolishing mandatory retirement would have no significant negative impact on the employment of minorities, youth or women. These latter groups tend to be involved in different occupations—manufacturing, retail, wholesale—while older workers tend to be involved in administrative and service occupations.

The elimination of mandatory retirement would have a marginal impact on the employment of older persons and a very small impact on the total labor force. About 200,000 additional persons would continue working by the year 2000 as a result of the elimination of mandatory retirement. This would mean a 5-percent increase in older workers, and these older workers would represent less than 0.2 percent of the total work force in the year 2000.

Research by the Department of Labor, the Social Security Administration, and others shows that the two primary factors in deciding when to retire are health condition and availability of retirement income. The majority of the work force retires between 62 and 65 because current Social Security and pension policy favors retirement at these ages. We do not want to force anyone to continue working beyond the time that they are able. However, workers should be able to choose to continue working, and the legislation we are introducing today will give them that opportunity.

I could go on, but I think it would be more helpful if I shared the thoughts of a constituent, Mary Ellen Wobbecke of Cleveland Heights, OH. Ms. Wobbecke wrote me the following:

DEAR SENATOR GLENN: It is my understanding that people are required to retire at the age of 70.

I am a 58-year-old school psychologist. Looking ahead, I do not want to be forced to retire at age 70. I did not start working until my 40's, and dropped out for a few years to attend graduate school. I am in good health, and want to build a decent retirement income. I would like to work for as long as I want to—75 or 80.

Therefore, I am asking you to look into this matter. Possibly you would be willing to start legislation which would make retirement an option, rather than a requirement.

In this day of increasing retirement costs (to Social Security) such a change in the law would be beneficial to the government's coffers, as well as to human beings.

Thank you.

MARY ELLEN WOBBECKE,
Cleveland Heights, OH.

Most Americans share Ms. Wobbecke's attitudes about forced retirement. A 1981 survey of the general population by Louis Harris & Associates found that 90 percent of those interviewed agreed with the statement, "Nobody should be forced to retire because of age if he wants to continue working and is still able to do a job."

Let us join together with other Americans in recognizing the skills and talents of older persons by protecting them from age discrimination in employment. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation to eliminate the age 70 cap in the Age Discrimination in Employment Act.●

By Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 1055. A bill to designate the Granite Reef Aqueduct of the Central Arizona project as the "Hayden-Rhodes Aqueduct"; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

HAYDEN-RHODES AQUEDUCT

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am introducing, today, a bill to change the name of the central Arizona project's Granite Reef Aqueduct to the Hayden-Rhodes Aqueduct, to honor the late Senator Carl Hayden, and former Congressman John Rhodes, two great men from Arizona who were so vitally important to the successful accomplishment of congressional authorization for the central Arizona project.

Water, the source of all life, has started to flow in the aqueduct that will bring our share of the Colorado River to the people, industries, and farms of central Arizona.

I'm not going to tell you now about this incredible water delivery system, the tunnels, the pumping plants, and the operations. I will simply remind you this is the largest reclamation project ever undertaken by the Federal Government, and it's very doubtful ther will ever be another like it.

Arizona's modern day history began with the construction of the Roosevelt Dam on the Salt River, that conserved water so that there might be life in Phoenix. The States future now depends on the central Arizona project, which will bring water all the way to Tucson and three counties in between.

We are going to have the celebrations beginning later this year befitting such a monumental engineering feat.

My purpose today is to speak of the dreamers and workers who said it could be done.

Two among these who stand out in everyone's mind are Senator Carl Hayden and Congressman John Rhodes. One was a native Arizona pioneer who became both an Arizona and a national institution. The other was one who settled in Arizona in more recent times to become one of its greatest statesmen.

Senator Hayden was born 108 years ago in the town of Tempe. At that time, the free-flowing Salt River passed by on its way to the Gulf of California. In those territorial days, all the settlers talked about was gold, Indians, and water. He took care of the small population as a sheriff of Maricopa County before statehood, and he took care of water resources during his lengthy career in Congress which extended 57 consecutive years, longer than any person in our history.

He had a number of great legislative accomplishments as a Member of the House for 15 years and the Senate for 42 years, like the Interstate Highway System and the GI bill, but the greatest and dearest to his heart was the central Arizona reclamation project.

Any mention of Carl Hayden always brings to mind his reputation as a man of few words and mighty deeds.

Though in his later years in the Senate he was President pro tempore, third in line of succession to the Presidency, chairman of the Appropriations Committee and Joint Congressional Committee on Printing, and sat on the Democratic Policy Committee and on Rules and Administration, he never abused the power those positions would portend.

He wasn't even widely known. Senator Hayden chose to be a work horse, not a show horse.

When he was asked by a reporter whether his successes stemmed from his power as appropriations chairman or seniority, Senator Hayden responded, "If you have a good project, the Congress will adopt it."

In the same interview, Senator Hayden made the statement, "You just don't enact important legislation except by coming to an agreement, where there are differences of opinion."

So it was with the central Arizona project. There were times during the many years the project was under consideration when many of the people back home were discouraged and impatient, and always Senator Hayden remained the optimist and kept his steady hands on course.

He was to see the central Arizona project signed into law by President Johnson in September 1968, the year before he retired from office and 5 years before he passed away in his beloved State.

Forty years from the date Senator Hayden took office in the House of Representatives, Arizona elected its first Republican to the House, John Rhodes. For the next 16 years, John Rhodes dedicated his time and his considerable talents to the passage of the central Arizona project. He served in that important role in bringing bipartisanship to the effort, not only in Congress but also in the State of Arizona.

He is one of those persons who took up residence in Arizona while serving there in the Air Force during World War II, and who, in a short time, became a leader in the affairs of the fast growing State.

About his service in Congress, George Will wrote:

One glance tells you: God had a Congressman in mind when he made John Rhodes. And he is just what the Founding Fathers had in mind when they designed the House of Representatives, the body intended to be closest to the commonman.

With all the many honors that came to John Rhodes during his 30-year career here, which included being elected unanimously four times as minority leader, he will always claim as his crowning achievement the enactment of the CAP.

He couldn't have planned his career in Congress better in order to have been successful in helping the small Arizona delegation attain passage of the central Arizona project and, afterward, assure the project was funded in an orderly manner. His first assignment was on the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, the authorizing committee, where he served with the dean of Western water, the late Wayne Aspinall. Later he took a seat on the Public Works Appropriations Subcommittee, working with the late Mike Kirwan.

His knowledge of the institution, his legislative craftsmanship, his personal dedication, perseverance, and integrity, made John Rhodes the ideal associate of Senator Hayden. To these two men Arizona owes a great debt of gratitude. The Hayden-Rhodes Aqueduct will revere their names in the annals of the history of the central Arizona project.

By Mr. PACKWOOD:

S. 1057. A bill to amend the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972 regarding activities directly affecting the coastal zone; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

COASTAL ZONE MANAGEMENT ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to amend the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972 [CZMA] to clarify the consistency provision of that act—section 307(c)(1). This action reflects my continuing concern over the proper relationship between the Federal Government and the States in coastal areas, as well as my desire to protect the CZMA and its consistency provision from further erosion. In addition, Mr. President, I am committed to protecting the spectacular and pristine shore of my native Oregon, which has been included in the Department of Interior's 5-year oil and gas leasing plan for the first time in many years.

Clarification to the CZMA was made necessary by the 1984 Supreme Court decision in Watt versus California. In that case, the Court held that Federal oil and gas lease sales in the Outer Continental Shelf do not "directly affect" State waters. As a result, the Court ruled that Federal oil and gas lease sales need not be consistent with federally approved State coastal zone management programs.

The Supreme Court's decision violates the intent of Congress, expressed through the CZMA, that the States be provided with the authority to develop and administer programs for managing their coastal resources. Coastal zone management was envisioned by Congress to be a cooperative partnership between the Federal Government and the States, with the States working toward national goals on a voluntary basis. In this way, a rational and balanced approach to both development and conservation would be assured.

Toward that end, Oregon and 27 other States have approved coastal zone management programs. In a number of cases, the States have had to enact new legislation and commit significant resources to coastal zone management. In return, the States were assurred that Federal activities directly affecting the coastal zone would, to the maximum extent practicable, be consistent with that State's coastal management plan.

The agreement expressed in the CZMA has been breached by the Supreme Court's decision. If the States are excluded from the negotiating table in the crucial first stages of oil and gas development, uncertainty, added delay, and expense for both the developers and the States will occur later in the process.

The Court's decision is not supported by the legislative history of the CZMA. In the Commerce Committee report accompanying the 1976 amendments to the act, the term "leases" was inserted wherever the phrase "licenses or permits" appeared, and the committee stated in its report:

> In practical terms, this means that the Secretary of the Interior would need to seek the certification of consistency from adjacent states . . . before entering into a binding lease agreement with private oil companies.

Since this language was insufficient to apprise the Court of Congress' intent, an amendment to the statute is required.

The amendment I am introducing today is the same one approved by the Commerce Committee and reported to the full Senate in the 98th Congress. It embodies clarifications dictated by national security and a modification requested by fishing interests. It embodies the best thinking of the affected parties and was the subject of hearings in the last Congress.

Mr. President, the bill I am introducing does not grant States any new authority nor give them veto power over oil and gas development in the Outer Continental Shelf. Instead, it simply restates the rights granted by Congress to the States in 1972 which the Supreme Court has incorrectly limited. This legislation will restore the correct balance between Federal and State interests in coastal resource protection and development by guaranteeing the States' a say in Federal activities directly affecting their coastal zones.●

By Mr. INOUYE:

S. 1059. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to authorize the appointment of health care professionals to the positions of Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs, the Surgeon General of the Army, the Surgeon General of the Navy, and the Surgeon General of the Air Force; to the Committee on Armed Services.

APPOINTMENT OF CERTAIN HEALTH CARE PROFESSIONALS

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which would provide that various positions within the Department of Defense Health Care Program would be opened up for a range of health care providers, depending upon their administrative and clinical skills.

For example, it is my understanding that the position of Surgeon General of the U.S. Army is not limited to physicians. Instead, such an appointment may be made from officers who have shown by extensive duty in the branch concerned, or by similar duty, that they are qualified for the appointment. The Department of the Army has informed me that the phrase "branch concerned" refers to the six corps of the Army Medical Department and, thus, for example, presumably a military dentist might be appointed to that position.

The legislation which I am introducing today would ensure that each of the Surgeons General and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs, shall, in fact, become eligible for interdisciplinary appointments.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1059

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That paragraph (2) of section 136(b) of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The President shall appoint the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs from among persons who are educationally and professionally qualified to furnish health care to other persons, including doctors of medicine, dentistry, or osteopathy, nurses, and clinical psychologists.".

SEC. 2. Section 3036 of title 10, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in subsection (b), by inserting before the period at the end of the third sentence the following: "and shall be appointed as prescribed in subsection (f)"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection (f):

"(f) The President shall appoint the Surgeon General from among commissioned officers in any corps of the Army Medical Department who are educationally and professionally qualified to furnish health care to other persons, including doctors of medicine, dentistry, or osteopathy, nurses, and clinical psychologists.".

SEC. 3. Section 5137 of title 10, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in the first sentence of subsection (a), by striking out "in the Medical Corps" and inserting in lieu thereof "who are educationally and professionally qualified to furnish health care to other persons, including doctors of medicine, dentistry, or osteopathy, nurses, and clinical psychologists"; and

(2) in subsection (b), by striking out "in the Medical Corps" and inserting in lieu thereof "who is qualified to be the Chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery".

SEC. 4. The first sentence of section 8036 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by striking out "designated as medical officers under section 8067(a) of this title" and inserting in lieu thereof "educationally and professionally qualified to furnish health care to other persons, including doctors of medicine, dentistry, or osteopathy, nurses, and clinical psychologists".●

By Mr. D'AMATO:

S. 1060. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to protect the benefit levels of individuals becoming eligible for benefits in or after 1979 by eliminating the disparity—resulting from changes made in 1977 in the benefit computation formula—between those levels and the benefit levels of persons who became eligible for benefits before 1979; to the Committee on Finance.

BENEFIT LEVELS OF SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFICIARIES AFTER 1979

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, there comes a time when compassionate justice calls out for action on behalf of the many who cannot stand here and speak for themselves. Therefore, I rise today to appeal to the basic sense of fairness that our Democracy embodies—a sense of what is right that can no longer be denied by halfhearted efforts and weak resolutions. It is to this end that I address the issue of the Social Security notch.

In the 98th Congress I cosponsored S. 2644, a bill designed to rectify this enormous injustice, but much to my dismay, the promise of security to our senior citizens did not receive the priority attention that it so rightfully deserved. The needs of our parents and grandparents did not, cannot, and will not, fade silently away. Thus, I offer legislation today that will give hope to those members of our society born between 1917 and 1921.

The notch was an ill-conceived solution to what was an already poorly designed Social Security formula. In 1973, the Board of Trustees of the Social Security trust funds revealed that recent computations of forthcoming benefits were grossly incorrect. In the simplest of terms, future adjustments for benefits had been doubly indexed for inflation. This double indexing was largely responsible for a 1977 projection of a long-range deficit equal to approximately 40 percent of the projected cost of the program. Obviously, something had to be done. The result, however, was cruel and unfair.

In 1977, Social Security legislation was passed that would deny future security to thousands of senior citizens. Realizing that the previously incorrect formula would both bankrupt the system and pay disproportionately high benefits to some recipients, there was a tremendous movement backward. A new formula was calculated for the payment of benefits to individuals becoming eligible after 1978. Less than 2 full years after the change would be made there would be an adjustment downward of benefits. This was not a great deal of time to change plans for those about to retire. Regardless of the intent of the 1977 amendments, the effect was devastating.

When the dust had settled, it was clear that if you reached 62 years of age after January 1, 1979, or were born after 1916, your hopes of a secure retirement had been dashed. Although attempts were made to lessen the impact for those immediately facing retirement, those born between 1917 and 1921, the ball had already started to roll downhill. If you were born January 1, 1917, and your neighbor was born December 31, 1916, you could be certain that if all other factors were the same, you would receive lower benefits based on your date of birth alone.

This arbitrary inequity sealed the fate of many unsuspecting senior citizens who would now spend their so-called years of leisure short of good housing, proper medical attention, and even decent meals. A society certainly falters when it neglects the needs of those who have given of themselves in times of war and times of peace for the sole purpose of balancing budgets. This type of action is not the mark of a great nation.

As great a damage as has been done, it is not too late to rectify this situation and to send the message that we still care. My legislation would compensate for some of this lost income by incorporating 3 more years of employment after age 62 for computation in Social Security benefits. This would be made available for those who reached 62 in 1979 or later. It also establishes an income ceiling of $29,700 for those 3 years after eligibility starts, and allows for a lump-sum retroactive payment for those who have forgone their rightful benefits since 1979. The $29,700 income ceiling allows for a justifiable benefit increase now. However, since this figure remains constant, it prevents mammoth escalations in the future with ample time for these future retirees to plan for their retirement years.

Every day we delay in our efforts to correct the notch we risk missing the chance to return these benefits to those who deserve them. Will this Government abandon those who fought so hard to survive the Great Depression and to save our country in World War II? Is the legacy of a free and strong nation to be answered in the manner the notch does? I urge my colleagues to join me in this struggle, and I ask unanimous consent that my bill be printed in the RECORD.

S. 1061. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to establish a program of delayed reentry and psychological readjustment assistance and vocational rehabilitation for Vietnam veterans; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VIETNAM VETERANS' DELAYED REENTRY AND PSYCHOLOGICAL READJUSTMENT AND VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE ACT

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today which addresses critically unmet readjustment needs of Vietnam veterans in the area of health care and research.

The Vietnam Veterans Delayed Reentry, Psychological Readjustment and Vocational Rehabilitation Assistance Act will accord the Veterans' Administration the necessary authority it requires to resolve the unique psychosocial problems affecting Vietnam veterans within the parameters of existing VA resources. All provisions of the bill have precedent in the comprehensive psychological readjustment assistance accorded World War II veterans by the VA.

Operation Outreach, the Veterans' Administration's psychological readjustment program, is limited in its resources, its authority and in its professional capabilities. The Delayed Reentry Act will provide Vietnam veterans who are suffering from psychological readjustment problems related to their military service or readjustment therefrom with priority treatment within the mainstream VA mental health resources. The act gives service-connected disability status, at a non-compensable level, to Vietnam and other eligible veterans who experience mental health problems which are determined by a VA psychiatrist or psychologist to require mental health services to facilitate successful readjustment to civilian life. This means that these veterans will receive priority in treatment and access to the VA's mental health resources before the 75 percent of veterans whose mental problems have no connection to their military service, but who are receiving mental health services from the VA. These veterans would not be subject to income limitations imposed upon non-service-connected veterans. They would receive no priority medical treatment other than that required to resolve their psychological readjustment problems.

Veterans' Administration psychiatrists and psychologists would be required to make special efforts to determine if Vietnam veterans' psychological problems were incurred or aggravated in the service, or are a post-traumatic stress disorder, thus warranting a service connection for a disability.

The Veterans' Administration's "Physician's Guide for Disability Evaluation Examinations" (March 1, 1985) warns of serious problems with possible prior misdiagnosis of veterans potentially suffering from PTSD.

DIAGNOSTIC PITFALLS

(a) Prior misdiagnosis. Since DSMII (Diagnostics and Statistics Manual of the American Psychiatric Association) provided no diagnostic category for a war stress reaction, post-traumatic stress disorder may have been misdiagnosed prior to 1980 as a personality disorder, a primary substance abuse disorder, a borderline state, or even schizophrenia. A high index of suspicion should be maintained for any war zone veteran carrying such a diagnosis from this period, especially if the record does not contain a highly detailed military history.

(b) Standardized Diagnostic Instruments. As of the mid-1980s, standardized instruments (e.g. the MMPI, DSI, SCL-90, and SADS) have not been validated for PTSD and ARE NOT capable of sorting symptoms and responses into the diagnosis of PTSD. Until sufficient standardized research is completed, such instruments cannot be utilized to document the presence or absence of PTSD. They may even suggest incorrect diagnoses.

The legislation requires the VA to institute a comprehensive research and training program for professional, paraprofessional, and lay personnel dealing with Vietnam veterans, to assure that they have the ability to counsel, screen, and test Vietnam and other veterans with PTSD and accord them effective therapy, readjustment, and rehabilitation for their unique medical and psychosocial readjustment problems.

Fewer than 10 percent of the patients in the VA health care system are Vietnam-era veterans with medical or psychological problems related to their military service. While the VA has made significant gains in recent years, many VA hospitals are ill-equipped (only 1 hospital in 10 has a special PTSD ward or program) to provide empathetic counseling, screening, and treatment for these veterans. Many VA medical personnel lack the training resources and experience to deal with the unique psychological effects of the Vietnam war and post-traumatic stress disorders.

The legislation also authorizes veterans whose serious mental health problems are related to their military service or readjustment therefrom, but do not warrant permanent disability compensation, to participate in the Veterans' Administration's vocational rehabilitation program under chapter 31 of title 38 United States Code.

There is precedent for this action in the comprehensive mental health and vocational rehabilitation assistance the VA accorded World War II veterans with psychoneurosis problems. Over one-half of the World War II disabilities were classified as "psychoneurosis". Those veterans were given temporary service connected disability status and accorded comprehensive mental health services and vocational rehabilitation. When the World War II veterans had resolved their psychological problems and readjusted to civilian life, their disability status was dropped.

Costs of the legislation will be absorbed within existing VA appropriations.●

By Mr. PRESSLER (for himself and Mr. KERRY):

S. 1062. A bill to amend chapter 73 of title 38, United States Code, to establish a program of comprehensive research on, studies of, and a review of the professional literature on potential physiological and psychological health programs affecting Vietnam veterans, and to require training for Veterans' Administration personnel in counseling, screening, testing, evaluation, treatment, therapy, readjustment, and rehabilitation relating to the unique medical and psychological needs of Vietnam veterans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

COMPREHENSIVE VIETNAM VETERANS RESEARCH AND TRAINING ACT

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, the Comprehensive Vietnam Veterans Literature Review and Training Act of 1985 will require the Veterans' Administration to conduct a comprehensive literature review, research, and studies of all potential health care detriments affecting Vietnam veterans and their natural children. Such review will be carried out in consultation and cooperation with the Secretary of Human Services and the Directors of the National Institutes of Health and Mental Health.

With the exception of the $100 million in research being carried out on agent orange, there is very little relevant activity in areas of potential health care detriment to Vietnam veterans. The vast majority of PTSD research is surveying the symptoms—not seeking the solutions to the problems that affect potentially one-half million veterans.

There is little in medical schools and psychiatric training, or in much VA medical training to prepare VA personnel to handle Vietnam-related problems—let alone provide the comprehensive and empathetic counseling and treatment that Vietnam veterans suffering the consequences of their military service deserve and require. Less than 10 percent of the patients the VA will see in a given year will be Vietnam veterans experiencing medical or psychological problems that are a consequence of their military service.

This legislation would require the VA to provide appropriate training to its personnel in the counseling and screening, testing, evaluation, treatment, therapy, readjustment, and rehabilitation of the unique psychosocial needs of Vietnam-era veterans.

As I have stated, the review of prior activities in the PTSD area is to be carried out by the VA Administrator, in consultation with the Directors of the National Institute of Health and the National Institute of Mental Health. This joint review will prove particularly beneficial as we attempt to dig deeper into the problems and symptoms of posttraumatic stress disorder. I am quite certain that the expertise these two Directors can bring to bear in this review will prove most beneficial to the Administrator.

Nine months after this bill is enacted, the VA Administrator will submit to Congress his recommendation on further activity that should be carried out in this area. These recommendations will be extremely helpful as we move to increase our limited knowledge on PTSD through meaningful additional research projects.●

S. 1063. A bill to amend section 376 of title 28, United States Code, to provide that certain judicial annuities for surviving spouses shall not terminate by reasons of remarriage of an annuitant after age 60; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JUDICIAL SURVIVORS ANNUITIES

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to correct an inequity in the law relative to judicial survivors annuities. This matter has been brought to my attention by my good friend and colleague, Congressman BILL GREEN. I am most pleased that the very distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Senator THURMOND, joins me in cosponsoring this bill. Our legislation is identical to Congressman GREEN's bill, H.R. 1472.

Our bill amends current law to provide that widowed annuitants of Federal judges 60 years of age or older shall not lose their annuities when they remarry. Our intent is to give the survivors of Federal judges the same rights afforded other annuitants under both the Social Security Amendments of 1977 (Public Law 95-216) and the civil service retirement survivor annuities reinstatement (Public Law 95-318).

This legislation corrects the 95th Congress' failure to consider the case of widowed annuitants of Federal judges 60 years of age or older who remarry. I urge my colleagues to give this measure their full support.●

S. 1064. A bill to provide for the continuation of the National Diffusion Network; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL DIFFUSION NETWORK ACT

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today I am introducing, along with my colleagues, Senators DENTON, NUNN, MITCHELL, BINGAMAN, KERRY, MATSUNAGA, HART, BRADLEY, and MOYNIHAN, legislation to provide for independent statutory definition for the National Diffusion Network.

This program was created in 1974 for the purpose of identifying and promoting programs of demonstrated excellence in school systems throughout the Nation. The network was engineered so that education programs which are successful in Maine could be made known to school systems in California, and could be implemented and adapted to the specific needs of each school. The NDN was developed on the premise that most education problems are currently being successfully addressed in at least one location in the United States, and that information concerning programs of proven success should be made available to school systems facing similar problems.

Through means of the network, schools can capitalize on efforts already undertaken by other schools to develop effective programs. In this manner, the NDN provides one of the swiftest and most cost-effective means for adoption of exemplary projects across the Nation, by avoiding duplicity of cost and duplicity of effort. The average cost of developing an NDN project is $250,000, but the cost of duplicating that program in another school district is only $708!

The National Diffusion Network identifies outstanding programs after careful review by the Department of Education's Joint Dissemination Review Panel, comprised of education experts throughout the country. Programs are approved for both demonstrated success and adaptability to other schools. The NDN then supports and strengthens these projects and operates a system of demonstration sites where these programs can be shown to potential adopters. NDN facilitators—one or more in each State—help a school in search of new programs find current NDN projects which will address that school's specific needs. Facilitators then assist with the training and technical assistance in implementation of the program.

National Diffusion Network Programs range from handicapped education, to basic skills development, to adult education, to exemplary programs in math and science. Since 1974, the NDN has grown from 76 to 391 programs. The most recent statistics available indicate that in 1982–83, over 18,000 public and private schools across the Nation have adopted NDN programs. Consequentially, over 66,000 teachers and administrators have received inservice training, and 1.7 million students benefited.

The importance of continuing the network's work was recognized in the Education and Consolidation Improvement Act of 1981. That act provided for the network's funding out of the discretionary funds reserved for the Secretary of Education. This placed the network in the unusual position of being named in the law but not being defined or described.

The legislation I am introducing would correct this discrepancy by providing a statutory definition for the National Diffusion Network. It would allow funding for the network to continue either through the Secretary's discretionary fund or through a separate congressional appropriation.

The National Diffusion Network clearly carries out the mandate from the President's Commission on Excellence in Education to promote educational quality in our schools. In its prescient report, A Nation at Risk, the Commission called for effective dissemination of the numerous examples of local success as a result of superior effort, and better understanding of learning and teaching.

One of the most successful NDN projects, project IPASS, is located in Pawtucket, RI. This program, through use of microcomputers, provides individual mathematics instruction for students in the intermediate grades who are having difficulty with math concepts, enabling them to catch up to the math level of their peers. This program has been so successful for these students, that they have been able to return to their regular classes in several months. Schools in 14 other States have already adopted this program at minimal cost. Another fine program which we are proud to have in Rhode Island is Cranston's Comprehensive Reading Program for grades K–12. This program combines a number of instructional approaches, including pacing, parent involvement, reading specialists and diagnostic assessment to work intensively on reading comprehension.

I would strongly urge my colleagues to learn about NDN projects in their own States. I am confident that in reviewing these projects my colleagues will become encouraged by the number of exemplary programs in this country. They will become encouraged that despite the gloomy pronouncements of the President's Commission, we do indeed have many programs of demonstrated excellence in many school districts in our Nation—programs which improve reading comprehension, mathematical reasoning, analytic thinking, or scientific inquiry.

I am sure that my colleagues will recognize the impact that dissemination of this information through the National Diffusion Network has on the quality of education in this country. I urge them to support and cosponsor this legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In addition to the funds available for any such fiscal year for the purposes of this section, there are authorized, for the purpose of carrying out this section, such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1986 throught 1989.●

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself and Mr. BIDEN) (by request):

S. 1065. A bill to authorize appropriations for the purpose of carrying out the activities of the Department of Justice for fiscal year 1986, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE APPROPRIATION AUTHORIZATION ACT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, at the request of the administration, and on behalf of myself and the ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee, Senator JOSEPH R. BIDEN, Jr., I am introducing a bill authorizing certain activities of, and appropriations for, the Department of Justice.

In the 98th Congress, the Department recommended legislation which would, first, authorize appropriations for the fiscal year, and, second, enact into the United States Code various authorities which traditionally have been part of the annual authorization bill, such as those relating to the purchase of vehicles and firearms, and some new provisions. The request for permanent authority was the result of "serious concern" on the part of the Department that authorizing legislation had not been enacted since fiscal year 1980, except on a continuing basis. Indeed, there was even a lapse in that continuing authorization during 1982.

Mr. President, Senator BIDEN and I have also been gravely disturbed by this deplorable situation. We therefore carefully examined the proposals relating to permanent authority with an eye toward minimizing the disruptive effects of the annual authorization process on the Department, while preserving the important oversight responsibilities of the Committee on the Judiciary. When the committee reported authorization bills relating to fiscal years 1984 and 1985, it adopted amendments in the nature of a substitute, which I offered, along with Senator BIDEN, with the aim of achieving that goal. Those amendments provided appropriations ceilings for the fiscal year, created permanent authority for routine, noncontroversial activities of the Department, and retained annual authority for sensitive Department activities and new functions requested by the Department. The bills, as amended, passed this body without objection. Unfortunately, the House never considered them. However, I am hopeful that the bill which we are introducing today will ultimately be enacted in a form similar to those passed by the Senate in the last Congress.

Mr. President, I want to thank the various committee members for their past assistance in processing authorization bills. Senator BIDEN and his staff have been especially cooperative in this effort. I look forward to continuing our fruitful working relationship in connection with the fiscal year 1986 measure. Hopefully, with the responsible cooperation of all of our colleagues here and in the other body, we will be able to enact an authorization bill for the first time in 6 fiscal years.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill which I am introducing, the letter of transmittal from the Department of Justice, and section-by-section analysis of the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF LEGISLATIVE AND INTERGOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, April 29, 1985.

Hon. GEORGE A. BUSH,
President of the Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is forwarded herewith a legislative proposal to meet the requirements of the Fiscal Year 1986 appropriations authorization process for the Department of Justice. As in the 1985 proposal, this legislation would incorporate much of the general authorization language previously contained in the Department's annual appropriations authorization bill within title 28 and other titles of the United States Code. This would take most of the funding related authorities out of the annual authorization cycle. Sections one through four of the proposal have been drafted to satisfy the statutory requirement of submitting to the Congress an annual funding level authorization request for the Department. This portion of the legislative proposal addresses only specific funding levels for 1986.

Again, we have taken the approach of drafting a two part proposal because of our serious concern regarding the current authorization process. The Department's 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985 authorization bills were not passed and action on continuing our authorities is often in doubt.

It is critical that the Department be provided a reasonable expectation of continuity for its basic programs. The authorization process of recent years has not met this expectation. On the contrary, it has fostered an environment which makes planning and program implementation most difficult. This has prompted our request for legislation which would take many basic, noncontroversial authorities out of the annual authorization cycle and place them into permanent law.

The annual authorization bill requests resource levels identical to the President's 1986 appropriation request. The "permanent" authorization portion requests most of the same general provisions the Department routinely includes in its authorization requests, e.g., undercover provisions for the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) and the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), authority to use confidential funds, and authority to pay rewards.

However, this authorization bill does include two significant changes which follow:

"Proposed Section 6(p) (p. 21) contains language which would allow INS to make payments from its appropriation for entering into contracts for detention of persons held under legal authority. This would provide the INS with the flexibility to ensure that proper care, safekeeping and subsistence is provided to detainees no matter where apprehension occurs. This is similar to authority provided to the Bureau of Prisons.

"Proposed Sections 599 and 599A (pp. 25-33) concerning undercover authority for the FBI and DEA have been revised to provide generic exemptions from laws applicable to appropriations, procurement and government corporations. This approach is similar to that proposed for the Department of Defense in the draft Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1986 which clarifies the intent of undercover operations while providing sufficient latitude to anticipate unforeseen circumstances. The section-by-section analysis provides illustrations of the types of exemptions this language provides."

We are confident the overall approach contained in this legislative proposal will adequately address the needs of the Congress to carry out its legislative mandate and oversight function while, at the same time providing for the Department's program continuity needs.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that there is no objection from the standpoint of the Administration's program to the presentation of these legislative proposals to the Congress and that their enactment would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

PHILLIP D. BRADY,
Acting Assistant Attorney General,
Office of Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

PROPOSED SECTIONS 1 AND 2

This portion of the legislative proposal addresses the provisions of section 204 of P.L. 94-503 which requires specific fiscal year authorization for appropriations for the Department of Justice for any fiscal year beginning on or after October 1, 1978.

Each of these provisions apply only to fiscal year 1986.

P.L. 94-504, Section 204:

No sums shall be deemed to be authorized to be appropriated for any fiscal year beginning on or after October 1, 1978, for the Department of Justice (including any bureau, agency, or other similar subdivision thereof) except as specifically authorized by Act of Congress with respect to such fiscal year. Neither the creation of a subdivision in the Department of Justice, nor the authorization of an activity of the Department, any subdivision, or officer thereof, shall be deemed in itself to be an authorization of appropriations for the Department of Justice, such subdivision, or activity, with respect to any fiscal year beginning on or after October 1, 1978.

Approved October 15, 1976.

PROPOSED SECTION 3

This language amends title 28 of the United States Code by creating a new Chapter 38 which would provide general authorizations for the Department of Justice especially the General Administration area.

Part II of title 28, United States Code, is amended by inserting after chapter 37 the following new chapter: Chapter 38 General Authorizations—Department of Justice.

§ 576. General authorizations—Department of Justice:

Proposed Section 576(a)—The Attorney General or his designee is authorized to make payments from Department of Justice appropriations for.

Proposed Section 576(a)(1) the hire of passenger motor vehicles:

This provision allows the Department of Justice to lease automobiles and general purpose vehicles from the General Services Administration for the purpose of providing necessary transportation for the Attorney General and other high-level staff in the Washington, D.C. area.

Proposed Section 576(a)(2) miscellaneous and emergency expenses authorized or approved by the Attorney General, the Deputy Attorney General, the Associate Attorney General, or the Assistant Attorney General for Administration.

This provision allows the Attorney General to respond to unforeseen circumstances where a need for action is clear but is not considered a normal cost of administration. Examples of these expenses include the Department's response to the Miami civil disturbances, the Atlanta mass homicide situation, and the influx of the Cuban boatlift entrants. Another situation which required the use of this emergency authority was the Department's initial involvement at Wounded Knee, South Dakota.

Proposed Section 576(a)(3) benefits authorized under section 901 (3), (5), (6A), (8), (9) and section 904 of the Foreign Service Act of 1980 22 U.S.C. 4081 (3), (5), (6A), (8), (9) and 22 U.S.C. 4084), and under the regulations issued by the Secretary of State:

The Foreign Service Act of 1946 was the basic statutory source for providing medical treatment and health care facilities for Department of Justice employees serving overseas. The Foreign Service Act of 1946 was replaced by the Foreign Service Act of 1980 (P.L. 96-465) on October 17, 1980. This language conforms the FY 1985 Authorization bill with certain benefits included in the Foreign Service Act of 1980. These provisions would allow the payment of certain travel benefits for employees stationed overseas and their dependents.

Proposed Section 576(a)(4) the purchase of insurance for motor vehicles and aircraft operated in official government business in foreign countries:

A number of overseas employees in the Department of Justice, in particular the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Drug Enforcement Administration, are required to operate motor vehicles or aircraft in the scope of their employment. In addition, a number of officers stationed in the United States at points along the borders use automobiles to enter Canada and Mexico in the performance of their official duties. This provision authorizes the Department to pay the premiums or fees for contracts of indemnification or insurance of officers, employees and agents for their liability or that of the United States.

If an employee of the Department, while operating a motor vehicle or aircraft on official business in a foreign country becomes involved in a collision which causes personal injury or property damage, then this section provides a basis for payment of damages to a third party. Failure by the United States to assume responsibility for these third party claims could possibly result in international incidents, especially in those countries with compulsory insurance laws. This provision protects employees and permits them to comply with the laws of embarassment or unfavorable publicity for the United States.

Proposed Section 576(a)(5) services as authorized by 5 U.S.C. 3109:

This provision allows the Department flexibility in its hiring practices, and maximized managerial efficiency. Section 3109 of title 5 requires that the use of temporary or intermittent services be authorized by an appropriation or other statute.

Proposed Section 576(a)(6) official reception and representation expenses in accordance with distributions, procedures, and regulations issued by the Attorney General:

This language authorizes the use of funds to cover the expenses of Department of Justice senior employees whose official positions entail the responsibility for establishing and maintaining the relationships of value to the Department.

Proposed Section 576(a)(7) per diem allowances and transportation expenses for an employee who serves in a law enforcement, investigative, protective, or administrative support and clerical capacity, and for members of his immediate family in accordance with regulations prescribed under 5 U.S.C. 5707 by the Administrator of the General Services Administration or his designee, when necessarily occupying temporary living accommodations at or away from the employee's designated post of duty because of a threat to life or property or because law enforcement, investigative or protective interests may be compromised.

Authority is proposed to provide per diem allowances and transportation expenses for law enforcement employees and transportation expenses for their families in emergency situation, principally because of threat to life or property. Primarily, the adjustment amends the current travel regulations to permit temporary living accommodations.

Proposed Section 576(a)(8) attendance at meetings in accordance with the regulations issued by the Attorney General:

This provision ensures that funds for attendance at meetings are expended in the legally required manner, thus eliminating waste and deliberate abuse.

Proposed Section 576(a)(9) assistance to individuals under section 501(c) of the Refugee Education Assistance Act of 1980 (P.L. 96-422) who meet the definition of "Cuban and Haitian entrant" under section 501(e) of said Act but for the application of paragraph (2)(B) thereof:

Title V of the Refugee Education Assistance Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-422) was added primarily to provide federal reimbursement for State and local government expenditures for Cuban and Haitian entrants. However, because of the way section 501(e) of the Act defines Cuban and Haitian entrants, funds provided for this program cannot be applied to Cuban and Haitian entrants who are under "final, nonappealable, and legally enforceable orders of deportation or exclusion." When Cuba refused to accept these individuals, this language was designed to overcome the restricting clause so benefits could be provided to these entrants. Recently an agreement was negotiated between the United States and Cuba which provides for repatriation of 2,764 Mariel Cubans. It is anticipated that this repatriation will ultimately have an effect on Community Relations Service activities; however, currently it is not possible to predict when or to what extent, the reception, processing and care of Cubans and Haitians program will be effected.

Proposed Section 576(a)(10) payment of interpreters and translators who are not citizens of the United States:

This legislation would permit the Attorney General to pay interpreters and translators who are not U.S. citizens. It is designed primarily to assist the Executive Office for Immigration Review (EOIR) in carrying out its functions. Translators and interpreters are necessary to facilitate communications between EOIR personnel and persons who do not speak or write English. EOIR has occasionally had difficulty in obtaining the services of native-born naturalized United States citizens. This provision would provide EOIR the capability to procure the services of interpreters and translators who, while not United States citizens, are legally allowed to work in the United States.

Proposed Section 576(b) Travel advances issued to Special Agents of the Department of Justice engaged in undercover activities shall be deemed to be public moneys within the meaning of 31 U.S.C. 3527:

This provision would relieve the agents of liability for loss of travel advances when there is no fault or negligence of the agents in consonance with the standards set forth in 31 U.S.C. 3527. The inherently dangerous nature of law enforcement should entitle DOJ agents (and their estates) to be afforded some protection from the potential liability for non-negligent loss of travel advance funds.

Proposed Section 576(c):

This section addresses authorization for those organizations within the General Legal Activities area and the Antitrust Division. The General Legal Activities area includes the Office of the Solicitor General, the Tax Division, the Criminal Division, the Civil Division, the Land and Natural Resources Division, the Office of Legal Counsel, the Civil Rights Division and U.S. National Central Bureau—INTERPOL.

Proposed Section 576(c) the Offices, Divisions, and subdivisions included in the Salaries and Expenses, General Legal Activities appropriation of the Department of Justice, and the Salaries and Expenses, Antitrust Division appropriation are authorized to make payments from their appropriations for:

Proposed Section 576(c)(1) the hire of passenger motor vehicles:

The Department of Justice leases automobiles and general purpose vehicles for the purpose of providing necessary transportation for high level staff in the Washington, D.C. area.

Proposed Section 576(c)(2) miscellaneous and emergency expenses authorized or approved by the Attorney General, the Deputy Attorney General, the Associate Attorney General, or the Assistant Attorney General for Administration:

The language authorizes the use of funds in unforeseen circumstances, such as expenses related to appointment of an independent counsel under the Ethics in Government Act.

Proposed Section 576(c)(3) expenses for collecting evidence, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General and accounted for on the certificate of the Attorney General or the Deputy Attorney General:

Funds authorized by this provision are used primarily by the Criminal Division to collect information.

Proposed Section 576(c)(4) advance of public moneys under 31 U.S.C. 3324:

Occasional advances have been made to State and local governments when they cannot legally begin performance on a contract until they receive partial payment in advance. Section 3324 of title 31, United States Code, prohibits the advance of public moneys unless authorized by the appropriation or other law.

Proposed Section 576(c)(5) expenses necessary under section 501(c) of the Refugee Education Assistance Act of 1980 (P.L. 96-422):

Executive Order 12341 dated January 29, 1982 transferred this program to the Department of Justice. The Criminal Division executes the duties and administration of the Attorney General's Review Panel which screens Cuban entrants, currently housed in the Atlanta Federal Penitentiary, for possible parole.

Proposed Sections 576(d). The Antitrust Division is authorized to make payments from its appropriation for the hire of passenger vehicles:

This provision allows the Antitrust Division to lease automobiles and general purpose vehicles from the General Services Administration for the purpose of providing necessary transportation for high level staff in the Washington, D.C. area.

Proposed Section 576(e) This section addresses certain authorizations for the Fees and Expenses of Witnesses area.

Section 576(f) The Department of Justice is authorized to make payments from the Fees and Expenses of Witnesses appropriation for.

Proposed Section 576(e)(1) expenses, mileage, compensation, and per diem of witnesses in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law:

The protection of witnesses activity provides financial security for government witnesses and potential government witnesses and their families in legal proceedings against persons alleged to be involved in organized criminal activity. Subsistence and relocation costs are paid from this appropriation.

Proposed Section 576(e)(2) advance of public moneys under 31 U.S.C. 3324:

Advances of fees and expenses are often necessary to ensure appearance of those witnesses who could not otherwise afford to appear. Section 3324 of title 31 United States Code prohibits the advance of public moneys unless authorized by an appropriation or other law.

Proposed Section 576(e)(3) planning, construction, renovation, maintenance, remodeling, and repair of buildings and the purchase of equipment incident thereto for protected witness safesites.

These proposed language changes would clarify the Department's authority to use this appropriation to fund specific expenses incident to the operation of the witness Security Program. Specifically, these changes pertain to the operation of command posts and the renovation and construction expenses associated with the establishment of "safesite" facilities for the protection of individuals admitted to the Witness Security Program and the processing and protection of individuals admitted to the Witness Security Program and the processing and protection of individuals considered to be protected entrants into the Witness Security Program. The language change clarifies (1) the extent of the authority given to the Attorney General by Title V, Section 502, of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, (P.L. 91-452) as it relates to "renovation" and "construction" in light of 41 U.S.C. 12 and 31 U.S.C. 1301, 1307 and (2) the source of funding to exercise the authority contained in Section 502.

Proposed Section 576(e)(4) No sums authorized to be appropriated shall be used to pay any witness more than one attendance fee for any one calendar day.

The limitation of one attendance fee reduces the possibility of excess payments to witnesses who testify more than once on any given calendar day.

Proposed Section 576(f) The Community Relations Service of the Department of Justice is authorized to make payments from its appropriation to pay for.

Proposed Section 576(f)(1) the hire of passenger motor vehicles:

Automobiles are leased from the General Services Administration for the purpose of providing necessary transportation for key personnel in carrying out their proper assignments.

Proposed Section 576(f)(2) payments in advance for grants, contracts, and reimbursable agreements and other expenses necessary under section 501(c) of the Refugee Education Assistance Act of 1980 (P.L. 96-422) for the processing, care, maintenance, security, transportation and reception and placement in the United States of Cuban and Haitian entrants.

On January 21, 1982, the President, by Executive Order 12341, transferred from the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) to the Department of Justice the responsibility and funding for the Cuban/Haitian entrant processing and care activities mandated by Section 501(c), Title V of the Refugee Education Assistance Act of 1980. This transfer of responsibility has been ratified by the Congress in past appropriation actions. The Department of Justice, with the concurrence of the Office of Management and Budget, has decided to consolidate the major activities related to the 501(c) program within the Community Relations Service (CRS). It was decided that since the President had vested the responsibility and the funding for this program in the Department of Justice, the personnel carrying out the program's principal activities would also be vested in the Department of Justice.

The consolidation of these activities required the transfer of personnel associated with the 501(c) Cuban/Haitian entrant related activities formerly situated in the Office of Refugee Resettlement, HHS to CRS. Since a considerable portion of the activities within this program is conducted through funding of grants or entering into contracts with qualified voluntary agencies or other qualified individuals to resettle or place Cuban/Haitian entrants, appropriate statutory language is required for CRS.

§ 577. Evaluations:

This section includes a generic authority to conduct evaluations of Department programs.

Proposed Section 577(a) The Attorney General shall perform periodic evaluations of the overall efficiency and effectiveness of the Department of Justice programs and any supporting activities funded by appropriations authorized and annual specific program evaluations of selected subordinate organizations' programs, as determined by priorities set by the Attorney General.

Proposed Section 577(b) Subordinate Department of Justice organizations and their officials shall provide all the necessary assistance and cooperation in the conduct of evaluations, including full access to all information, documentation, and cognizant personnel, as required.

A similar provision was included in most of the past Department of Justice Appropriation Authorization Acts. It was again proposed by the Department for fiscal year 1984 and is being reinitiated by the Department in an effort to continue to improve its management capabilities and to work with Congress to increase the overall efficiency and effectiveness of the Department's programs.

PROPOSED SECTION 4

Section 263a of title 22, United States Code, is amended by adding the following at the end thereof:

The Attorney General is authorized to make payments from the Salaries and Expenses, General Legal Activities appropriation of the Department of Justice for expenses necessary to host, at intervals of ten years or longer, the annual meeting of General Assembly of INTERPOL, and to periodically sponsor INTERPOL conferences on emerging topics of international crime.

The additional legislative authority being proposed is extremely important to INTERPOL-USNCB, and to the United States in general. Currently, the United States, through the INTERPOL-USNCB, is exerting a greater leadership role in the international organization. In this regard, the INTERPOL-USNCB, with substantial member country support, has successfully initiated an ongoing fiscal audit and review of the INTERPOL General Secretariat and plans are currently being made to implement a similar management review of the General Secretariat.

Additionally, during the recent meeting of the General Assembly, the United States achieved the support of the majority of the INTERPOL member countries in passing specific resolutions relating to international crime. The increasing leadership role of the United States in the international organization also is reflected by this country's successful efforts to seek and win the Presidency of INTERPOL in 1984. As United States involvement continues to expand, it is important that a highly credible United States image is maintained and that INTERPOL member countries perceive that the United States is assuming a greater participatory role in the organization.

One way to accomplish this objective is for the INTERPOL-USNCB to host the annual meeting of the INTERPOL General Assembly at intervals of approximately ten years or more. The proposed legislative language would clarify the USNCB's role in hosting such annual meetings and conferences.

PROPOSED SECTION 5

This section would establish general statutory authority for the Department of Justice to accept gifts.

Sec. 5(a). Chapter 31 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by inserting after the section 525 the following new section.

§ 525a. Department of Justice gift acceptance authority:

Sec. 525a. (a) The Attorney General is authorized to accept and utilize, on behalf of the United States, any gift, donation, or bequest of real or personal property for the purpose of aiding or facilitating the work of the Department of Justice. No gift may be accepted:

(1) that attaches conditions inconsistent with applicable laws or regulations, or

(2) that is conditioned upon or will require the expenditure of appropriated funds unless such expenditure has been authorized by Act of Congress. Gifts from foreign governments may be accepted only pursuant to the Foreign Gifts Act, 5 U.S.C. 7342.

(b) The Attorney General shall promulgate rules for accepting gifts pursuant to this provision, to ensure, among other things, that no gifts are accepted under circumstances that will create a conflict of interest for the Department of Justice.

(c) Gifts and bequests of money and proceeds from sales of property received as gifts or bequests that were not immediately useable by the Department of Justice may be credited to any appropriation or fund that is available for similar purposes to remain available until expanded upon order of the Attorney General.

(d) Gifts, bequests of property and property acquired from the proceeds deposited in accordance with subsection (c), and which are no longer required by the Department of Justice for its needs and the discharge of its responsibilities, shall be reported to the Administrator of General Services for transfer, donation, or other disposal in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended.

(e) Property accepted pursuant to this section and the proceeds credited to appropriations or funds pursuant to subsection (c) shall be used as nearly as practicable in accordance with the terms of the gift or bequest.

(f) For the purpose of Federal income, estate, and gift taxes, property accepted under subsection (a) of this section shall be considered as a gift or bequest to or for the use of the United States."

The proposed legislation would authorize the Attorney General to accept gifts, donations, or bequests of real or personal property to aid the Department in carrying out its functions. Gifts that attach conditions inconsistent with applicable laws or that are conditioned upon or require the expenditure of appropriated funds (unless the expenditure had been authorized by Congress) may not be accepted. The Attorney General is required to establish rules to insure that no gifts are accepted that will create a conflict of interest for the Department.

The Department of Justice currently has no general statutory authority to accept gifts, although similar authority exists for the Treasury Department (31 U.S.C. 3113), and the Administrative Conference of the United States (5 U.S.C. 575). Without specific authorizing legislation, no federal official may properly accept gifts or contributions for particular agencies to augment congressional appropriations.

The Department has received a variety of gift offers, including an offer of eight Morgan Horses to the Immigration and Naturalization Service, and an offer to the FBI of a piece of real property that was to be used in a foreign counterintelligence operation.

Proposed Section 5(b) Subsection 871(c) of title 21, United States Code, is hereby repealed.

21 U.S.C. 871—(c) The Attorney General may accept in the name of the Department of Justice any form of devise, bequest, gift, or donation where the donor intends to donate property for the purpose of preventing or controlling the abuse of controlling substances. He may take all appropriate steps to secure possession of such property and may sell, assign, or transfer, or convey any such property other than moneys.

The Department is proposing that this subsection be deleted so that all organizational units within the Department will be subject to a standard gift provision. The provisions of this subsection will be fully subsumed by proposed section 525a of title 28.

PROPOSED SECTION 6

This language amends Section 104 of the Act of March 14, 1980, 94 Stat. 97, and provides certain authorizations for the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission.

Proposed Section 6 Section 104 of the Act of March 14, 1980, [P.L. 96-209, 22 U.S.C. 1622] is amended by adding the following at the end thereof:

The Commission is authorized to make payments from its appropriation for the hire of passenger motor vehicles (for field use only);

Motor vehicles are used from time to time for the field work of the Commission.

Advances of funds abroad:

There have been instances in previous programs where the Commission was required to advance funds to foreign governments as part of leasing arrangements or contracts abroad. Federal law prohibits the advance of funds unless authorized by the appropriation or other law.

PROPOSED SECTION 7

Subsection 7(a) Part II of title 28, United State Code, is amended by inserting after chapter 35 the following new chapter: Chapter 36—General Authorizations—United States Attorneys and Marshals Service.

§ 555. General Authorization—United States Attorneys and Marshals Service:

This section amends part II of title 28, United States Code, to provide certain authorizations for United States Attorneys and the United States Marshals Service.

Proposed Section 555 Appropriations for the United States Attorneys and Marshals are available for:

Proposed Section 555 (a) the purchase of firearms and ammunition and attendance at firearms matches and law enforcement competitions:

The marshals and their deputies perform hazardous law enforcement duties which not only require expertise in handling weapons but superior physical ability. These duties range from providing personal protection to judges and witnesses to arresting and transporting felons. Attendance at firearms matches increases the expertise in the use of firearms and is a significant factor in boosting agent morale. This authority is identical to the authority requested for other organizations in the Department. Marshal Service personnel work hand in hand with State and local law enforcement officials. Participation in these matches and competitions promotes physical fitness and contributes to the improved conduct of this agency's mission.

Proposed Section 555(b) lease and purchase of law enforcement and passenger motor vehicles.

Personnel require passenger motor vehicles to perform their routine duties such as service of government process, movement of prisoners, and the transportation of protected witnesses.

Proposed Section 555(c) supervision of United States prisoners in non-federal institutions:

This clause provides for the safekeeping of United States prisoners in non-Federal institutions. Minimum standards for health and general welfare for the United States prisoners are required when contracting with non-Federal institutions for housing such prisoners.

Proposed Section 555(d) bringing to the United States from foreign countries persons charged with crime:

Extradition involves the return of fugitives ordered surrendered by a foreign government pursuant to a request by the United States.

Proposed Section 555(e) purchase, lease, maintenance, and operation of aircraft:

Aircraft is used to transport United States prisoners in the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service. This authority will be utilized only if it will result in a cost savings. The U.S. Marshals Service does not intend to acquire a large number of aircraft.

Proposed Section 555(f) payment of rewards and the purchase of evidence and payments for information.

This language provides for payments to informants or other persons aiding the Government in the arrest of suspects, federal law violators and their prosecution.

Proposed Section 8(b) Section 1921 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows: § 1921. United States Marshal's fees:

This subsection would amend section 1921 of title 28, United States Code, as follows:

"(a)(1) The United States Marshals or deputies shall routinely collect, and a court may tax as costs, the fees for the following:

"(A) serving a writ of possession, partition, execution, attachment in rem, or libel in admiralty, warrant, attachments, summons, capias, or any other writ, order or process in any case or proceeding:

"(B) serving a subpoena or summons for a witness or appraiser:

"(C) forwarding any writ, order, or process to another judicial district for service:

"(D) the preparation of any notice of sale, proclamation in admiralty, or other public notice or bill of sale:

"(E) the keeping of attached property (including boats, vessels, or other property attached or libeled), actual expenses incurred, such as storage, moving, boat hire, or other special transportation, watchmen's or keepers' fees, insurance, and an hourly rate including overtime for each deputy marshal required for special services, such as guarding, inventorying, and moving:

"(F) copies of writs or other papers furnished at the request of any party:

"(G) necessary travel in serving or endeavoring to serve any process, writ, or order, except in the District of Columbia, with mileage to be computed from the place where service is returnable to the place of service or endeavor:

"(H) overtime expenses incurred by deputy marshals in the course of serving or executing civil process.

"(2) The Marshals shall collect, in advance, a deposit to cover the initial expenses for special services required under subparagraph (E), and periodically thereafter such amounts as may be necessary to pay such expenses until the litigation is concluded. This paragraph applies to all private litigants, including seamen proceeding pursuant to section 1916 of this title.

"(3) For purposes of subparagraph (G), if two or more services or endeavors, or if an endeavor and a service, are made in behalf of the same party in the same case on the same trip, mileage shall be computed to the place of service or endeavor which is most remote from the place where service is returnable, adding any additional mileage traveled in serving or endeavoring to serve on behalf of that party. If two or more writs of any kind, required to be served in behalf of the same party on the same person in the same case or proceeding, may be served at the same time, mileage on only one such writ shall be collected.

"(b) The Attorney General shall prescribe from time to time regulations for the fees to be collected and taxed under subsection (a).

"(c)(1) The United States Marshals Service shall collect a commission of 3 per centum of the first $1,000 collected and 1 per centum on the excess of any sum over $1,000 for seizing or levying on property (including seizures in admiralty), disposing of such property by sale, setoff, or otherwise, and receiving and paying over money, except that the amount of the commission shall be within the range set by the Attorney General. If the property is not disposed of by marshal's sale, the commission shall be in such amount, within the range set by the Attorney General, as may be allowed by the court. In any case in which the vessel or other property is sold by a public auctioneer, or by some party other than the marshal or his deputy, the commission authorized under this subsection shall be reduced by the amount paid to such auctioneer or other party. This subsection applies to judicially ordered sales and execution sales, without regard to whether the judicial order of sale constitutes a seizure or levy within the meaning of State law.

"(2) The Attorney General shall prescribe from time to time regulations which establish a minimum and maximum amount for the commissions collected under paragraph (1).

"(d) The United States marshals may require a deposit to cover any of the fees and expenses prescribed under this section.

"(e) Without regard to the provisions of 31 U.S.C. 3302(b), the United States Marshals Service is authorized to credit amounts from fees and expenses collect (including amounts for overtime expenses) for the service of civil process, including complaints, summonses, subpoenas, and similar process performed by the Marshals to its current appropriations account (Salaries and Expenses, United States Attorneys and Marshals) for the purpose, only, of carrying out those activities."

The language would permit the Attorney General to set fees for the service of process commensurate with the costs incurred to serve such process. The receipts from such fees are to be credited to the U.S. Marshals Service's appropriation.

PROPOSED SECTION 8

This section would amend chapter 301 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new section after section 4002 providing certain authorizations for the Support of United States Prisoners appropriation.

Chapter 301 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 4011 the following new section:

§ 4002A. Support of United States Prisoners:

"The Attorney General or his designee is authorized to make payments from the Support of United States Prisoners appropriation for:

Proposed Section 4002A(a) the necessary clothing, medical aid:

The contracts with non-Federal institutions provide funds to these institutions to confine, clothe and provide medical care for certain unsentenced Federal inmates, for certain sentenced Federal prisoners awaiting transportation to permanent incarceration facilities, and for certain Federal prisoners called to non-Federal facilities for judicial purposes.

Proposed Section 4002A(a) (continued) and payment of rewards:

This authority is required to allow the U.S. Marshals Service to pay rewards for the capture of escaped Federal prisoners who were in the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service at the time of escape.

Proposed Section 4002A(b) entering into contracts or cooperative agreements for the necessary construction, physical renovation, and the acquisition of equipment, supplies, or material required to improve conditions of confinement and services of any facility which confines Federal detainees in accordance with regulations issued by the Attorney General: Provided, that amounts made available for constructing any local correctional facility shall not exceed the cost of constructing space for the average Federal prison population to be housed in the facility or in other facilities in the same correctional system as projected by the Attorney General. Provided further, that following agreement on or completion of any federally assisted correction facility construction the availability of the space acquired for Federal prisoners with these Federal funds shall be assured and the per diem rate charged for housing prisoners in the assured space shall not exceed operating costs for the period of time specified in the cooperative agreement.

This language would provide the Department with statutory authority to use the "Support of United States Prisoners" appropriation for the purpose of improving local jail facilities and conditions.

PROPOSED SECTION 9

Chapter 33 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 537 the following new sections:

§ 538. General Authorizations—Federal Bureau of Investigation:

Proposed Section 538(a) The Federal Bureau of Investigation is authorized to make payments from its appropriation for:

Proposed Section 538(a)(1) expenses necessary for the detection and prosecution of crimes against the United States:

Authorization for appropriations for the detection and prosecution of crimes against United States includes the expenses necessary for the FBI to conduct investigations of those violations of Federal law for which the FBI has responsibility. In addition to national priority areas of organized crime, foreign counterintelligence terrorism and white-collar crime, the FBI has primary jurisdiction over numerous other Federal statutes concentrating on such areas as interstate crimes, forcible crimes against banking institutions, civil rights, and fugitive investigations. Typical expenses include personnel compensation and benefits, travel and transportation of persons and property, rent, communications and utilities, capital and noncapital equipment, and supplies.

Proposed Section 538(a)(2) protection of the person of the President of the United States and the person of the Attorney General:

Appropriations are utilized for the purposes of assuring the security of the President, and of the Attorney General, when so requested by the Department of Justice. Typical expenses include personnel compensation and travel costs.

Proposed Section 538(a)(3) acquisition, collection, classification and preservation of identification and other records and their exchange with, and for the official use of, the duly authorized officials of the Federal Government, of States, cities, and other institutions, such exchange to be subject to cancellation if dissemination is made outside the receiving departments or related agencies:

Authorization for appropriations for the collection and preservation of identification and other records and their exchange with authorized officials includes expenses for the maintenance at FBI Headquarters of the Central Records System, consisting of over six million investigative, personnel, applicant, administrative, and general case files, and for the maintenance of fingerprint identification records submitted by over 20,000 authorization agencies. In addition, this authorization for appropriations includes expenses of providing information contained in FBI records to other Federal agencies in compliance with Executive Order 10450 and to authorized officials of States, cities, and other institutions.

Proposed Section 538(a)(4) such other investigations regarding official matters under the control of the Department of Justice and the Department of State as may be directed by the Attorney General:

This language would permit the expenditure of funds at the direction of the Attorney General for other investigations regarding official matters as determined by the Attorney General.

Proposed Section 538(a)(5) purchase for police-type use and lease of passenger motor vehicles:

Authorization for appropriations for motor vehicles includes the expenses associated with the purchase and hire of motor vehicles utilized by investigative and support personnel in the performance of their official duties.

Proposed Section 538(a)(6) purchase, lease, maintenance and operation of aircraft:

Authorization for appropriations for aircraft includes the expenses of acquisition, lease, maintenance and operation of aircraft strategically located in various field offices of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Proposed Section 538(a)(7) purchase of firearms and ammunition and attendance at firearms matches and law enforcement competitions:

Authorization for appropriations for firearms and ammunition includes the expenses of acquisition and maintenance of firearms and implementation of FBI firearm training programs utilized by employees in the performance of their official duties.

A provision has been added to allow FBI agents to attend certain organized firearms matches. Participation in competitive matches with other law enforcement agencies improves firearms proficiency and improves the morale of the agents. At times these matches include other law enforcement competitions designed to test certain physical skills related to the profession. Other entities in the Justice Department are requesting authority to permit their agents to attend firearm matches and other competitions.

Proposed Section 538(a)(8) payment of rewards:

Authorization for appropriations for payment of rewards is utilized on a selective basis for information which results in the identification and apprehension of individuals being sought by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Proposed Section 538(a)(9) expenses to meet unforeseen emergencies of a confidential character, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General and to be accounted for on the certificate of the Attorney General or the Deputy Attorney General:

The word "solely" has been dropped from the phrase "solely on the certification of the Attorney General." The word "solely" restricts the certification process by providing that only the Attorney General is permitted to approve the use of funds for such purposes. Removing the word "solely" and adding the Deputy Attorney General permits expeditious certification by either the Attorney General or the Deputy Attorney General.

Proposed Section 538(a)(10) payment of travel and related expenses for immediate family members of employees, including expenses incurred for specialized training and orientation, if such training and orientation is not offered by the Department of State, in connection with a transfer to Puerto Rico, other territories and possessions of the United States, and assignment in a legal attache post outside the territory of the United States:

This provision would allow family members of agents under transfer to Puerto Rico, other territories and possessions of the United States and legal attaché posts outside U.S. territories, travel and per diem allowances. These expenses would be incurred when receiving orientation training prior to the agent's departure to a new assignment. Family success in adjusting to life in a new environment depends largely upon language ability, attitude and cultural awareness prior to arrival. Training and orientation will be coordinated by the FBI Academy and the State Department's Foreign Service Institute.

Proposed Section 538(a)(11) research related to investigative activities:

The Technical Services Division of the FBI is involved in several long-term, high-technology research projects. These projects relate to audio and technical collection systems, surveillance aids, and radio engineering. Due to the high degree of sophistication some of these projects involve, some aspects of them are contracted out to private industry. Because funding for these projects is available only on a fiscal year basis, the FBI has experienced some reluctance on the part of private companies to sign contracts to assist in our research. No year authority for research activities will be requested in the appropriation act to permit the FBI to enter into long-term contracts and enhance its ability to conduct scientific research.

Proposed Section 538(b) None of the sums authorized to be appropriated for the Federal Bureau of Investigation shall be used to pay the compensation of any employee in the competitive service.

All positions in the Federal Bureau of Investigation are excepted from the competitive service and the incumbents of such positions occupy positions in the excepted service.

§ 539. Fees for furnishing identification services:

Proposed Section 539 The Federal Bureau of Investigation may establish and collect fees for the processing of non-criminal employment and licensing fingerprint cards. Such fee is to represent the cost of furnishing the service. The funds collected shall be credited to the Salaries and Expenses, Federal Bureau of Investigation appropriation without regard to 31 U.S.C. 3302(b), and shall be available only to the extent specified in appropriations acts and may be used to pay for salaries and other expenses incurred in operating the FBI Identification to fiscal year for such purposes. There will be no fee assessed in connection with the processing of requests for criminal history records by criminal justice agencies for criminal justice purposes or for employment in criminal justice agencies. 'Criminal justice agency' is defined in 28 C.F.R. 20.3."

This language allows the FBI to set fees for services rendered by the Identification Division and permits the receipts from these fees to be utilized in paying for the operation of the FBI's Identification Division.

PROPOSED SECTION 10

This section would amend section 6 of the Act of July 28, 1950, 64 Stat. 380 (8 U.S.C. 1555) to provide authorization for certain activities for the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Proposed Section 10 "Section 6 of the Act of July 28, 1950, (c. 503) (8 U.S.C. 1555) is amended to read as follows:

§ 6. General authorizations—Immigration and Naturalization Service:

Proposed Section 6 "The Immigration and Naturalization Service is authorized to make payments from its appropriation for:

Proposed Section 6(a) interpreters and translators who are not citizens of the United States and distribution of citizenship textbooks to aliens without cost to such aliens:

Translators and interpreters are necessary to facilitate communication between Service personnel and persons not speaking or writing English. While protecting the interests of the non-English speaking people, translators and interpreters are primarily used during deportation proceedings and other legal hearings. The textbooks provide clear instruction in citizenship responsibilities to applicants for naturalization. Similar authority exists at 8 U.S.C. 1555.

Proposed Section 6(b) allowances, (at such rate as may be specified from time to time in the appropriation act), to aliens while held in custody under the immigration laws, for work performed:

Payment of allowances to aliens held in custody is for work such as serving meals and cleaning. Such expenses are incurred by the Detention and Deportation function. This authority is contained in existing law (8 U.S.C. 1555).

Proposed Section 6(c) expenses to meet unforeseen emergencies of a confidential character, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General and accounted for on the certificate of the Attorney General or the Deputy Attorney General:

These expenses are often necessary to protect the identity of informants. This proposal would amend existing authority (8 U.S.C. 1555) by deleting the word "solely" from the phrase "solely on the certificate of the Attorney General." The provision permits the expenditure of funds for the collection of evidence and information of a confidential nature. The word "solely" restricts the certification process by providing that only the Attorney General is permitted to approve the use of funds for such purposes. Removing the word "solely" and adding the Deputy Attorney General permits expeditious certification by either the Attorney General or the Deputy Attorney General.

Proposed Section 6(d) expenses related to the purchase and/or lease of privately owned horses:

This language would allow INS to use horses in its routine activities under the Border Patrol program. Remote areas not accessible by motor vehicle require the use of such horses to accomplish routine patrol. Similar authority currently exists in 8 U.S.C. 1555.

Proposed Section 6(e) advance of cash of aliens for meals and lodging while enroute:

Section 3324 of title 31, United States Code, prohibits the advance of public money unless authorized by appropriation or other law.

Proposed Section 6(f) expenses and allowances incurred in tracking lost persons as required by public exigencies in aid of State or local law enforcement agencies:

Local law enforcement agencies often request Border Patrol agents to participate in searches for lost persons. Without the proposed language, there is no authority to pay officers while on a regular tour of duty or on an overtime basis. This authorization is also necessary to clarify employee rights to benefits if injured or killed while conducting searches.

Proposed Section 6(g) payment of rewards and purchases of evidence and payments for information:

Such expenses are incurred by the border and interior enforcement program activities of the Service. Payment of rewards is used for purposes of a confidential nature such as informant development, infiltration, and information or evidence in civil or criminal prosecution.

Authority is also included for the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) to use funds for the purchase of evidence and to make payments for information. The nature of investigative operations carried out by INS requires the use of certain amounts of money for the purchase of evidence and for the payment for information. This provision would permit the use of appropriated funds for these purposes. The use of these funds is particularly critical to the anti-smuggling program.

Proposed Section 6(h) purchase for police-type use for the current fiscal year and lease of passenger motor vehicles:

Motor vehicles are a necessary enforcement tool of the Service for pursuit of individuals in violation of the immigration laws, transportation of aliens in custody, travel status situations, and case investigation.

Proposed Section 6(i) purchase, lease maintenance, and operation of aircraft:

Aircraft are used in the Service by the Border and Interior Enforcement Program Activities. These aircraft are an effective method of detecting the presence of persons attempting or completing unlawful entry into the United States, while providing further assistance in the containment and apprehension of these individuals.

Proposed Section 6(j) purchase of firearms and ammunition and attendance at firearms matches and law enforcement competition:

Firearms and ammunition are provided primarily to Border Patrol and Investigative Agents of the Service for use in emergency situations only. Firearms matches are conducted to develop the expertise and safe use of these weapons. Similarly, matches many times offer additional competitions which test the skills of agents.

Proposed Section 6(k) planning, acquisition of sites and construction of new facilities and construction, operation, maintenance, remodeling, and repair of buildings and the purchase of equipment incident thereto, subject to the provisions of 8 U.S.C. 1252(c) and 18 U.S.C. 4003:

These buildings and associated equipment are used primarily for purposes of alien detention, inspections and border patrol facilities and in some cases, living quarters for officers assigned to remote locations. Language has been added to refine the authority INS has to construct facilities. INS believes that additional language for planning, site acquisition and construction is required to clarify its authority to construct facilities. No year authority is requested for this provision in order to facilitate construction.

Proposed Section 6(l) refunds of maintenance bills, immigration fines, and other items properly returnable except deposits of aliens who become public charges and deposits to secure payment of fines and passage money:

Occasionally it is necessary to refund immigration fines collected from a carrier when it is determined, through adjudication, that such fines were improperly imposed and other items properly refundable.

Proposed Section 6(m) acquisition of land as sites for enforcement fences, and construction incidental to such fences:

Enforcement fences are utilized by the Service in certain border areas as part of its prevention strategy, and are useful for the purpose of controlling the flow of unlawful entrants into areas where apprehension is most assured.

Proposed Section 6(n) research related to immigration enforcement to remain available until expended:

This research includes the evaluation of new technology for its applicability to Service programs, such as communications systems and detection services. Research and development projects have, for example, been directed toward new capabilities in wide area surveillance through infrared and radar devices, in automatic inspections of large vehicles and rooms through heartbeat detector techniques, and in selected enforcement and public service activities through satellite and digital communications techniques. No year authority for research activities will be requested in the appropriation act.

Proposed Section 6(o) contracting with individuals for personal services abroad, provided that such individuals shall not be regarded as employees of the United States Government for the purpose of any law administered by the Office of Personal Management:

The INS currently has the authority to hire aliens, by contract, abroad. This authority continues to be necessary to hire investigative assistants, translators and other aliens for a variety of purposes in its foreign offices. Recruitment actions for clerical positions in many overseas offices meet with negative results because few qualified people apply due to the remote locations and adverse living conditions. Even when recruitment is successful, the time between selection and actual arrival at post often leaves the INS foreign offices without the assistance of necessary support personnel for extended periods of time. There are dependents of U.S. Foreign Service Offices, U.S. military personnel and other U.S. citizens at all posts where INS has an office who are available for temporary employment.

Proposed Section 6(p) entering into contracts with private organizations or entities for the safekeeping, care and subsistence of persons held under any legal authority.

The Attorney General has general authority to hold under legal custody those who violate Immigration laws and (18 U.S.C. 4082) to "designate as a place of confinement any available, suitable, and appropriate institution or facility, whether maintained by the Federal Government or otherwise." INS frequently has a need to place Federal detainees in quarters located far away from Federal facilities and in some cases Federal facilities are unable to accommodate additional persons held by INS. This provision would allow INS to enter contracts with a variety of agencies, public or private for the custody and care of persons held under legal authority. This concept of contractual placement of offenders in the facilities of another jurisidiction or agency is recognized in 18 U.S.C. 4002 (placing Federal offenders in state institutions), and in 18 U.S.C. 5003 (contracting to receive state offenders in Federal institutions).

PROPOSED SECTION 11

This section would provide authority for the Immigration and Naturalization Service to accept voluntary services.

Notwithstanding the provisions of 31 U.S.C. 1342, the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service is authorized to accept voluntary and uncompensated services to assist the Service in information services to the public. Persons providing voluntary services shall not be used to displace any federal employee and shall not be considered a federal employee for any purpose except for the purpose of chapter 81 of title 5 United States Code, (relating to the compensation for injury) and 28 U.S.C. §§ 2671-2680 Code, (relating to Tort Claims).

The authority to use voluntary services without compensation in the information service function of INS would remove the restriction in 31 U.S.C. 1342 for the acceptance of such services. This provision will enable voluntary agencies to operate "ask immigration" tape libraries in conjunction with INS and maintain roving information representatives in INS' waiting rooms.

PROPOSED SECTION 12

This section would provide authority for certain activities of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

PROPOSED SECTION 12 Chapter 13 of title 21, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 904 the following new chapter:

§ 905. General authorizations—Drug Enforcement Administration.

Proposed Section 905(a) the lease and purchase of law enforcement and passenger motor vehicles:

This provision authorizes the hire of passenger motor vehicles to give special agents the capability to operate in a clandestine mode to carry out surveillance and other enforcement techniques in enforcing the drug abuse laws. The vehicles must appear to be the same as those found in the environment in which the agents carry out their mission, with no identification to indicate that the vehicles are government owned. Vehicles purchased for law enforcement use typically cost more than fleet-type vehicles. DEA's operations, such as special investigative matters and regulatory and training activities, are most effectively and efficiently carried out through use of passenger motor vehicles hired or leased from private organizations and from GSA.

Proposed Section 905(b) payment in advance for special tests and studies by contract:

This section provides for payment in advance for research contracts and projects. Advance payment is the most efficient financing mechanism. These projects maximize the effectiveness of DEA's operations by development of new or improved techniques and procedures and increase the quantity and quality of investigative evidence. Section 3323 of title 31, U.S.C., prohibits advance payments unless specifically authorized by the appropriation or other law.

Proposed Section 905(c) payment in advance for expenses arising out of contractual and reimbursable agreements with State and local law enforcement and regulatory agencies while engaged in cooperative enforcement and regulatory activities in accordance with section 503a(2) of the Controlled Substances Act [P.L. 91-513 (1970)]:

This section provides for the funding of contracts, cooperative or reimbursable agreements, executed for the purpose of supporting cooperative law enforcement activities with State and local law enforcement, and with controlled substances regulatory agencies. These agreements aid in suppressing the abuse of controlled substances through the institution and prosecution of cases in courts and before licensing boards. It is often necessary to advance funds to accomplish this activity.

Section 905(d) expenses to meet unforeseen emergencies of a confidential character to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General, and to be accounted for on the certificate of the Attorney General or the Deputy Attorney General:

These expenses are necessary for the purchase or procurement of information or evidence from individuals whose identity must be protected and remain confidential, to meet emergency situations threatening the personal safety of Government agents, informants, or their families, and for emergency situations in which disclosure of the expenditures would jeopardize investigative operations. The above language has been included in DEA's appropriation since 1974. It had also been included in the appropriation of predecessor agencies from 1966. The word "solely" has been dropped from the phrase "solely on the certificate of the Attorney General." The provision permits the expenditure of funds for the collection of evidence and information of a confidential nature. The word "solely" restricts the certification process by providing that only the Attorney General is permitted to approve the use of funds for such purposes. Removing the word "solely" and adding the Deputy Attorney General permits expeditious certification by either the Attorney General or the Deputy Attorney General.

Proposed Section 905(e) payment of rewards:

This language provides for payments to informants or other persons aiding the Government in the arrest of suspects, seizure of drugs, or prosecution of violators.

Proposed Section 905((f) publication of technical and informational material in professional and trade journals, and purchase of chemicals, apparatus, and scientific equipment:

This section provides for the publication of materials which help to develop an awareness of Federal drug enforcement and drug industry regulatory activities. The DEA laboratories perform analyses of drug evidence and provide expert scientific testimony for prosecutorial purposes. In-depth ballistics examinations are performed to help determine sources of drugs. Research capability is maintained in the areas of forensic science and advanced technological development.

Proposed Section 905((g) purchase, lease, maintenance, and operation of aircraft:

This provision authorizes aviation support for DEA operations. Aircraft is needed by DEA to detect and interdict narcotics traffic primarily through air to ground surveillance, overwater surveillance, and undercover operations. The use of aircraft by drug traffickers is well documented. The use of aircraft for surveillance activities can often replace complex or impossible ground surveillance.

Proposed Section 905(h) contracting with individuals for personal services abroad, provided that such individuals shall not be regarded as employees of the United States Government for the purpose of any law administered by the Office of Personnel Management.

The authority to employ aliens and U.S. citizens, by contract, abroad, is necessary to hire investigative assistants, translators, clerical and other personnel in foreign offices. Staffing clerical positions with personnel hired in the U.S. is difficult in many foreign offices and impossible in others due to remote locations and adverse living conditions. Recruitment of personnel from the U.S., even if successful, is generally met with extended delays in the selectee's actual arrival at post. Hence, without this authority, the office will be without clerical assistance for extended periods of time. There are dependents of State Department Foreign Service Officers, U.S. Military personnel and other U.S. citizens at all posts where DEA has an office who are available for temporary employment.

Proposed Section 905(i) purchase of firearms and ammunition and attendance at firearms matches and law enforcement competitions.

This section provides authorization for appropriations for firearms and ammunition including the expense of acquisition and maintenance of firearms utilized by employees in the performance of their official duties. These duties include participating in firearms matches to develop the expertise and safe use of weapons. Events which offer firearms matches often include competitions which test other law enforcement skills. Under this authority it would be clear that agents could also participate in these other competitions.

Proposed Section 905(j) research related to enforcement and drug to remain available until expended.

This language provides for a research and engineering program covering the following elements: search and surveillance; communications; command and control; regulatory support; forensic sciences; operational support; and special studies. No year authority for research activities is being sought in the Department's appropriation request.

Proposed Section 905(k)—payment of travel and related expenses for immediate family members of employees, including expenses incurred for specialized training and orientation, if such training and orientation is not offered by the Department of State, in connection with a transfer to Puerto Rico, other territories and possessions of the United States, and assignment in a post outside the territory of the United States.

This provision would allow family members of agents under transfer to Puerto Rico, other territories and possessions of the United States and posts outside U.S. territories, travel, and per diem allowances. These expenses would be incurred when receiving orientation training prior to the agent's departure to a new assignment. Family success in adjusting to life in a new environment depends largely upon language ability, attitude, and cultural awareness prior to arrival. Training and orientation will be coordinated by the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, Glynco, Georgia.

PROPOSED SECTION 13

This section would amend chapter 303 of title 18 United States Code by inserting a new section 4044 authorizing certain activities by the Bureau of Prisons.

Proposed Section 13 Chapter 303 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 4043 the following new section:

§ 4044. General authorizations—Bureau of Prisons:

The Bureau of Prisons is authorized to make payments from its appropriation for:

Proposed Section 4044(a) the administration, operation, and maintenance of Federal penal and correctional institutions, including supervision and support of United States Prisoners in non-Federal institutions, and for inmate legal services within the system:

The Bureau contracts with appropriate non-Federal agencies for facilities to board certain types of Federal offenders and detainees. These facilities are used for the following reasons:

(1) to relieve overcrowding in Federal institutions,

(2) to offer protection to Federal offenders who would be in danger in Federal institutions,

(3) to help keep inmates near to their home communities,

(4) to provide programs not generally available in Federal institutions, and

(5) to place juvenile offenders in residential facilities.

Provision is also made to make available certain funds for inmate legal services, such as assistance programs where law students represent inmates on selected matters.

Proposed Section 4044(b) purchase and lease of law enforcement and passenger motor vehicles:

Hire of passenger motor vehicles is often necessary for personnel in travel status. Law enforcement and passenger vehicles are used to transport offenders and for routine functions in the operation of Bureau of Prison facilities.

Proposed Section 4044(c) compilation of statistics relating to prisoners in Federal penal and correctional institutions:

Administrative services performs up-to-the-minute locator and status information on all individuals in the custody of the Attorney General; population counts and statistics; and inter-agency, inter-facility and intra-institution population movement schedules, notices, statistics, and computation and update of sentences; this language provides the authority to gather such information.

Proposed Section 4044(d) purchase of firearms and ammunition and medals and other awards:

Expenses are incurred for the purchase of firearms and ammunition necessary to ensure the security of Bureau facilities and to respond to emergency situations. Correctional officers must undergo weapons familiarization as a routine part of their training activities. Medals and other awards are offered to staff personnel for recognition of superior performance.

Proposed Section 4044(e) payment of rewards:

Rewards are offered for information leading to the capture of those who escape from Federal penal or correctional institutions.

Proposed Section 4044(f) purchase and exchange of farm products and livestock:

The farm program uses available land resources to produce food products that will be used by federal correctional institutions. Farm productivity provides a primary hedge against inflation and spiraling food costs. The effective use of equipment, supplies, and manpower is used to achieve maximum use of the available land resources.

Proposed Section 4044(g) construction of buildings at prison camps:

Projects of $100,000 or less may be charged to the Salaries and Expenses appropriation of the Bureau of Prisons. Projects in excess of $100,000 are funded from the Buildings and Facilities appropriation with the specific line items being approved by Congress. The nature of construction at prison camps involves housing and administrative facilities for staff and inmates at the prison camp.

Proposed Section 4044(g) (continued) and acquisition of land as authorized by 18 U.S.C. 4010:

Acquisition of land primarily to perimeter security and camp expansions. As correctional programs expand, the necessity for renovation or expansion of existing facilities often requires the acquisition of additional acreage. Section 4010 of title 18, U.S.C., indicates the Attorney General may acquire land, if authorized by law.

Proposed Section 4044(h) entering into contracts with private organizations or entities for the safekeeping, care and subsistence of persons held under any legal authority:

The Bureau of Prisons has general authority (18 U.S.C. 4042) to "provide for the safekeeping, care, and subsistence of all persons charged with or convicted of offenses against the United States, or held as witnesses or otherwise." A place of confinement may be "any available, suitable, and appropriate institution, whether maintained by the Federal government or otherwise" (18 U.S.C. 4082). With expanding prison populations, and special needs for some offenders, this authorization recognizes the necessity of looking to a variety of agencies, public and private, for the custody and care of Federal offenders and others who are in lawful federal custody. It provides specific authority to enter contracts, wherever the appropriate contract source may be found, for the care of such persons. This concept of contractual placement of offenders in the facilities of another jurisdiction or agency is recognized in 18 U.S.C. 4002 (placing Federal offenders in state institutions), and in 18 U.S.C. 5003 (contracting to receive state offenders in federal institutions).

Proposed Section 4044(i) planning, acquisition of sites and construction of new facilities and constructing, remodeling, and equipping necessary buildings and facilities at existing penal and correctional institutions, including all necessary expenses incident thereto, by contract or force account:

This section provides authority for the Buildings and Facilities activities of the Bureau of Prisons. This language authorizes appropriations for planning, acquisition of sites, constructing, remodeling, and equipping of penal and correctional institutions. The purposes of the site acquisition and planning process are to identify and locate suitable sites for construction of new correctional facilities, and to design these facilities in a manner consistent with security, program requirements, and architectural innovation. Construction is completed within a specific timetable, within budgeted costs, and with the highest degree of quality. Rehabilitation and renovation of buildings is made to effect repairs at existing facilities and make modifications to accommodate new correctional programs.

Proposed Section 4044(i) (continued) to remain available until expended:

A no-year appropriation allows for the efficient and effective implementation of construction funds. Construction schedules are approximately two years for the warmer climates and two and a half years for the colder climates. Proposed Section 4044(i) (continued) and the labor of United States prisoners may be used for work performed with sums authorized to be appropriated by this subsection.

The use of inmate labor contributes to lower construction costs and provides inmates with vocational training opportunities.

PROPOSED SECTION 14

Chapter 307 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 4128, the following new section:

§ 4129. General authorizations—Federal Prison Industries, Inc.:

Proposed Section 4129 Federal Prison Industries, Incorporated, is authorized to make such expenditures, within the limits of funds and borrowing authority and in accord with the law, and to make such contracts and commitment without regard to fiscal year limitations as provided by section 104 of the Government Corporation Control Act, as may be necessary in carrying out the program set forth in the budget for the current fiscal year for such corporation:

This section will provide authorization for Federal Prison Industries (FPI) Inc. FPI was created by Congress in 1934 and is a wholly-owned Government Corporation. Its mission is to employ and train Federal inmates through a diversified program providing products with a minimum of competition to private industry and labor. Employment provides inmates with work, develops occupational knowlege and skills, and earns money for personal expenses and family assistance.

Proposed Section 4129 (continued) including purchase and hire of passenger motor vehicles.

Passenger motor vehicles are often necessary for personnel in travel status. Purchase of passenger motor vehicles is required for routine functions in the day-to-day operation of the factories at Bureau facilities.

PROPOSED SECTION 15

This section would amend 18 U.S.C. 4204(b) by adding a new paragraph at the end for the United States Parole Commission.

Proposed Section 15 Section 4204(b) of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

Proposed Section 4204(b)(9) hire passenger motor vehicles.

Passenger motor vehicles are necessary for transporting hearing examiners to hearing locations. This language would authorize the hire of such vehicles.

PROPOSED SECTION 16

This section would amend Title II of part 28, United States Code by inserting a new Chapter 40 which would provide authorization for certain undercover investigative operations of the FBI and the DEA.

Proposed Section 16 Part II of title 28, United States Code, is amended by inserting after chapter 37 the following new chapter: Chapter 40—Undercover Investigative Operations.

§ 599 Federal Bureau of Investigation undercover operations:

PROPOSED SECTION 599

(a) The authorizations and exemptions provided below may be utilized—

For each operation designed to detect and prosecute crimes against the United States, only upon written certification of the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (or, if designated by the Director, a member of the Undercover Operations Review Committee) and the Attorney General (or if designated by the Attorney General, a member of such committee) that any action authorized by this section is necessary for the conduct of such undercover investigation, or

In each operation designed to collect foreign intelligence or to conduct foreign counterintelligence, upon written certification of the Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation (or if designated by the Director, the Assistant Director, Intelligence Division) and the Attorney General (or if designated by the Attorney General, the Counsel for Intelligence Policy). The type of exemptions sought for each operation shall be specified on the certification and the use of the exemptions for each operation will be reviewed during the operation by the Director's designee.

(1) Appropriations may be used for purchasing or leasing property, buildings, facilities, space, goods, insurance, licenses and any equipment necessary to establish and/or operate an undercover operation. These acquisitions shall be made in accordance with prevailing commercial practices so long as such practices are consistent with the purposes of the undercover operation. Laws applicable to federal acquisitions, federal property management and federal appropriations shall not apply to any acquisition for a certified undercover operation where compliance with such laws would risk compromise of the undercover nature of the investigation.

(2) Appropriations may be used to establish, acquire and/or operate proprietary corporations or business entities in accordance with prevailing commercial practices so long as such practices are consistent with the purposes of the undercover operation. Laws applicable to federal appropriations and government corporations shall not apply to any transaction for a certified undercover operation where compliance with such laws would risk compromise of the undercover nature of the investigation.

(3) Appropriations and the proceeds from such undercover operation may be deposited in banks or other financial institutions and may be used to offset necessary and reasonable expenses incurred in such operation without deposit in the Treasury.

(b) As soon as the proceeds from an undercover investigative operation with respect to which an action is authorized and carried out under subparagraphs (3) of paragraph (a) are no longer necessary the conduct of such operation, such proceeds or the balance of such proceeds remaining at the time shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

(c) If a corporation or business entity established or acquired as part of an undercover operation under subparagraph (2) of paragraph (a) with a net value of over $150,000 is to be liquidated, sold, or otherwise disposed of, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, as much in advance as the Director or his designee determines is practicable, shall report the circumstances to the Attorney General and the Comptroller General. The proceeds of the liquidation, sale, or other disposition, after obligations are met, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

(d)(1) The Federal Bureau of Investigation shall conduct a detailed financial audit of each undercover investigative operation which is closed in fiscal year 1985, and each fiscal year thereafter and shall,

(A) submit the results of such audits in writing to the Attorney General, and

(B) not later than 180 days after such undercover operation is closed, submit a report to the Congress concerning such audit.

(2) The Federal Bureau of Investigation shall also submit a report annually to the Congress specifying—

(A) the number, by programs, of undercover investigative operations pending as of the end of the one-year period for which such report is submitted,

(B) the number, by programs, of undercover investigative operations commenced in the one-year period preceding the period for which such report is submitted, and

(C) the number, by programs, of undercover investigative operations closed in the one-year period preceding the period for which such report is submitted and, with respect to each such closed undercover operation, the results obtained. With respect to each such closed undercover operation which involves any of the sensitive circumstances specified in the Attorney General's Guidelines on FBI Undercover Operation, such report shall contain a detailed description of the operation and related matters, including information pertaining to—

(i) the results,

(ii) any civil claims arising out of the investigation, and

(iii) identification of such sensitive circumstances involved, that arose at any time during the course of such undercover operation.

(e) For purposes of paragraph (d)(1)—

(1) the term "closed" refers to the point in time at which—

(a) all criminal proceedings (other than appeals) are concluded, or

(b) covert activities are concluded, whichever occurs later;

(2) the term "employees" means employees, as defined in 5 U.S.C. 2105, of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and

(3) the terms "undercover investigative operation" and "undercover operation" means any undercover investigative operation of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (other than a foreign counterintelligence undercover investigative operation)—

(A) in which—

(i) the gross receipts (excluding interest earned) exceed $150,000, or

(ii) expenditures (other than expenditures for salaries of employees) exceed $150,000, and

(B) which is exempt from laws applicable to federal appropriations and government corporations, except that clauses (A) and (B) shall not apply with respect to the report required under subparagraph (2) of such paragraph.

Subsection (a) has been revised to clarify the administrative latitude conferred upon the FBI for the limited purpose of conducting undercover or intelligence activities. These activities require agents to conform to the standards of commercial, and sometimes even criminal environments. It is impossible to conform to these standards while complying with statutory requirements that govern routine government procurement and financial transactions.

In specifically authorizing the undercover and intelligence activities Congress never intended to compromise the security of these missions or the safety of the agents involved. In the current authorization Congress has exempted the FBI from certain procurement and financial requirements e.g. the Anti Deficiency Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1341.

It is not intended that the authorities contained in this section will relieve the Department of Justice from any requirements of the applicable laws other than in the establishment and conduct of its undercover operations.

The list of exemptions, cited in the current authorization, merely provides illustrations of the types of requirements from which an undercover operation must be exempt in order to preserve its cover. This list is not exhaustive, and cannot be, for it is virtually impossible to foresee and list by citation every statutory requirement that is incompatible with undercover and/or intelligence activities.

Therefore, subsection (a) has been revised to describe the exemptions, categorically in order to capture and embody all the provisions that may compromise the security of an investigation or an agent. The categorical references are to the following areas of law: federal acquisitions, federal property management, federal appropriations and government corporations. These categories of law are defined below.

"Federal Acquisitions" means acquiring by contract supplies or services by purchase or lease using appropriated funds. These activities are principally governed by Title 41 of the United States Code. Requirements that may be incompatible with undercover operations include: the requirement to advertise proposed purchases and proposed contracts for supplies or services, 41 U.S.C. § 5, and the inclusion of certain contract provisions such as the Walsh-Healey Act representations and stipulations required by 41 U.S.C. § 35, the requirement to purchase blindmade products, 41 U.S.C. §§ 46–48C; the prohibition on advance payment to contractors, 41 U.S.C. 255; and the requirements for full and open competition, 41 U.S.C. § 253.

"Federal property management" means the control and use of Federal real and personal property. These activities are principally governed by Title 40 of the United States Code. Restrictions that may be incompatible with undercover operations include: limitations on the leasing of space in the District of Columbia, 40 U.S.C. § 34; restrictions on construction loans for office buildings by Government Corporations 40 U.S.C. § 33a; limitation on a Government Corporation's leasing of buildings in addition to the limitation on rental rates, 40 U.S.C. § 129; and the prohibition against the inclusion, in any lease, of any provision regarding the repair of real property, 40 U.S.C. § 303b.

"Federal appropriations" means an act of Congress that permits Federal agencies to incur obligations and to make payments out of the Treasury for specified purposes. Fiscal transactions are principally governed by Title 31 of the United States Code. Restrictions that may be incompatible with undercover operations include: the proscription against the depositing of money in banks or lending money 31 U.S.C. § 3302(a); the requirement that all proceeds shall be deposited into the General Treasury 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b); the requirement that contracts and leases must be reexecuted at the beginning of each fiscal year 31 U.S.C. § 1341; the prohibition against the acceptance of voluntary services 31 U.S.C. § 1342; the proscription against installing telephones in private residence 31 U.S.C. § 1348; and the requirement that agreements be in writing in order to record an amount as an obligation 31 U.S.C. § 1501.

"Government Corporations" means a corporation that is owned by the Federal Government. While undercover proprietaries are not government corporations in the classical sense, they nonetheless meet the definition set out in 31 U.S.C. § 9101(1). Government Corporations are principally governed by Title 31 of the United States Code. Requirements that pertain to Government Corporations that may be incompatible with undercover operations include: the requirement that each corporation established or acquired by an agency be specifically authorized by Congress 31 U.S.C. § 9102; the requirment for budget submission 31 U.S.C. § 9103; the requirement that the Comptroller General's approval be obtained prior to the consolidation of a corporation's cash 31 U.S.C. § 9107; and the limitation on the obligations that may be issued by a government corporation, 31 U.S.C. § 9108.

It is intended that undercover operations utilize these exemptions only to the extent that it is necessary, and that they be conducted in a manner that is generally consistent with ordinary commercial practice. Adequate safeguards are provided in the legislation and the Department's own procedures to ensure the proper application of the exemptions and the appropriate use of funds. The type of exemptions sought will be specified on the certification. The use of the exemptions will be reviewed by the Director's designee, during the operation. Review of the use of the exemptions means periodic examination of submissions of exemption data, from field divisions, at FBI headquarters. "Director's designee" means: (1) with respect to undercover operations, a member of the Undercover Operations Review Committee or other person designated by the Director who is responsible for review of exemption data; (2) with respect to foreign counter intelligence operations, a member of the Intelligence Division Undercover Operations Review Committee or other person designated by the Director who is responsible for review of exemption data.

Subsection (a) requires that the exemptions be used only upon the certification of a high ranking official that the activities that warrant exempt status are necessary for the undercover or intelligence mission. Subsection (c) requires that the assets from a liquidated business revert to the Treasury. Subsection (d) requires the FBI to audit closed undercover operations and report the findings to the Attorney General and Congress. These safeguard will ensure the integrity and efficiency of these law enforcement activities while the exemptions will ensure their effectiveness.

"§ 599A. Drug Enforcement Administration Undercover Operations:

PROPOSED SECTION 599A

(a) The authorizations and exemptions provided below may be ulitized—for each operation designed to detect and prosecute crimes against the United States, only upon written certification of the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration or his designee and the Attorney General or his designee that any action authorized by this section is necessary for the conduct of such undercover investigation. The type of exemptions sought for each operation shall be specified on the certification and the use of the exemptions will be reviewed during the operation by the Administrator's designee.

(1) Appropriations may be used for purchasing or leasing property, buildings, facilities, space, goods, insurance licenses and any equipment necessary to establish and/or operate an undercover operation. These acquisitions shall be made in accordance with prevailing commercial practices so long as such practices are consistent with the purposes of the undercover operation. Laws applicable to federal acquisitions, federal property management and federal appropriations shall not apply to any acquisition for a certified undercover operation where compliance with such laws would risk compromise of the undercover nature of the investigations.

(2) Appropriations may be used to establish, acquire and/or operate proprietary corporations or business entities in accordance with prevailing commercial practices so long as such practices as consistent with the purposes of the undercover operation. Laws applicable to federal appropriations and government corporations shall not apply to any transaction for a certified undercover operation where compliance with such laws would risk compromise of the undercover nature of the investigation.

(3) Appropriations and the proceeds from such undercover operation may be deposited in banks or other financial institutions and may be used to offset necessary and reasonable expenses incurred in such operation without deposit in the Treasury.

(b) As soon as the proceeds from an undercover investigative operation with respect to which an action is authorized and carried out under subparagraph (3) of paragraph (a) are no longer necessary for the conduct of such operation, such proceeds or the balance of such proceeds remaining at the time shall be deposited into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

(c) If a corporation or business entity established or acquired as part of an undercover operation under subparagraph (2) with a net value over $150,000 is to be liquidated, sold or otherwise disposed of, the Drug Enforcement Administration, as much in advance as the administrator or his designee determines is practicable, shall report the circumstances to the Attorney General and the Comptroller General. The proceeds of the liquidation, sale, or other disposition, after obligations are met, shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

(d)(1) The Drug Enforcement Administration shall conduct a detailed financial audit of each undercover investigative operation which is closed in fiscal year 1986, and each fiscal year thereafter and shall,

(A) submit the results of such audits in writing to the Attorney General, and

(B) not later than 180 days after such undercover operation is closed, submit a report to the Congress concerning such audit.

(2) for the purposes of paragraph (1), 'undercover investigative operation' and 'undercover operation' mean any undercover investigative operation of the Drug Enforcement Administration—

(A) in which

(i) the gross receipts exceed $150,000, or

(ii) expenditures (other than expenditures for salaries of employees) exceed $150,000 and

(B) which is exempt from laws applicable to federal appropriations and government corporations.

Subsection (a) has been revised to clarify the administrative latitude conferred upon the DEA for the limited purpose of conducting undercover or intelligence activities. These activities require agents to conform to the standards of commercial, and sometimes even criminal environments. It is impossible to conform to these standards while complying with statutory requirements that govern routine government procurement and financial transactions.

In specifically authorizing the undercover and intelligence activities Congress never intended to compromise the security of these missions or the safety of the agents involved. In the current authorization Congress has exempted the DEA from certain procurement and financial requirements e.g. the Anti Deficiency Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1341.

It is not intended that the authorities contained in this section will relieve the Department of Justice from any requirements of the applicable laws other than in the establishment and conduct of its undercover operations.

The list of exemptions, cited in the current authorization, merely provides illustrations of the types of requirements from which an undercover operation must be exempt in order to preserve its cover. This list is not exhaustive, and cannot be, for it is virtually impossible to foresee and list by citation every statutory requirement that is incompatible with undercover activities.

Therefore, subsection (a) has been revised to describe the exemptions categorically in order to capture and embody all the provisions that may compromise the security of an investigation or an agent. The categorical references are to the following areas of law: federal acquisitions, federal property management, federal appropriations and government corporations. These categories of law are defined below.

"Federal Acquisitions" means acquiring by contract supplies or services by purchase or leasing using appropriated funds. These activities are principally governed by Title 41 of the United States Code. Requirements that may be incompatible with undercover operations include: the requirement to advertise proposed purchases and proposed contracts for supplies or services, 41 U.S.C. § 5, and the inclusion of certain contract provisions such as the Walsh-Healey Act representations and stipulations required by 41 U.S.C. § 35, the requirement to purchase blind-made products, 41 U.S.C. §§ 46–48C; the prohibition on advance payment to contractors, 41 U.S.C. § 255; and the requirements for full and open competition, 41 U.S.C. § 253.

"Federal property management" means the control and use of Federal real and personal property. These activities are principally governed by Title 40 of the United States Code. Restrictions that may be incompatible with undercover operations include: limitations on the leasing of space in the District of Columbia, 40 U.S.C. § 34; restrictions on construction loans for office buildings by Government Corporations 40 U.S.C. § 33a; limitation on a Government Corporation's leasing of buildings in addition to the limitation on rental rates, 40 U.S.C. § 129; and the prohibition against the inclusion, in any lease, of any provision regarding the repair of real property, 40 U.S.C. § 303b.

"Federal Appropriations" Means an act of Congress that permits Federal agencies to incur obligations and to make payments out of the Treasury for specified purposes. Fiscal transactions are principally governed by Title 31 of the United States Code. Restrictions that may be incompatible with undercover operations include: the proscription against the depositing of money in banks or lending money 31 U.S.C. § 3302(a); the requirement that all proceeds shall be deposited into the General Treasury 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b); the requirement that contracts and leases must be reexecuted at the beginning of each fiscal year 32 U.S.C. § 1341; the prohibition against the acceptance of voluntary services 31 U.S.C. § 1342; the proscription against installing telephones in private residences 31 U.S.C. § 1348; and the requirement that agreements be in writing in order to record an amount as an obligation 31 U.S.C. § 1501.

"Government Corporations" means a corporation that is owned by the Federal Government. While undercover proprietaries are not government corporations in the classical sense, they nonetheless meet the definition set out in 31 U.S.C. § 9101(1). Government Corporations are principally governed by Title 31 of the United States Code. Requirements that pertain to Government Corporations that may be incompatible with undercover operations include: the requirement that each corporation established or acquired by an agency be specifically authorized by Congress 31 U.S.C. § 9102; the requirement for budget submission 31 U.S.C. § 9103; the requirement that the Comptoller General's approval be obtained prior to the consolidation of a corporation's cash 31 U.S.C. § 9107; and the limitation on the obligations that may be issued by a government corporation, 31 U.S.C. § 9108.

It is intended that undercover operations utilize these exemptions only to the extent that it is necessary. and that they be conducted in a manner that is generally consistent with ordinary commercial practice. Adequate safeguards are provided in the legislation and Department's own procedures to ensure the proper application of the exemptions and the appropriate use of funds. The type of exemptions sought will be specified on the certification. The use of exemptions will be reviewed by the Administrator's designee, during the operation. Review of the use of the exemptions means periodic examination of submissions of exemption data from field divisions, at DEA headquarters. With respect to undercover operations, Administrator's designee means any person designated by the Administrator who is responsible for review of exemption data.

Subsection (a) requires that the exemption be used only upon the certification of a high ranking official that the activities that warrant exempt status are necessary for the undercover or intelligence mission. Subsection (b) requires that all proceeds received from undercover operations, that are not longer necessary to the operation, revert to the General Treasury. Subsection (d) requires the DEA to audit every closed undercover operation and report the findings to the Attorney General and Congress. These safeguards will ensure the integrity and efficiency of these law enforcement activities while the exemptions will ensure their effectiveness.

By Mr. MURKOWSKI (for himself and Mr. STEVENS):

S. 1066. A bill for the relief of Harold M. Wakefield; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF HAROLD M. WAKEFIELD

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I am introducing a private relief bill for Mr. Harold M. Wakefield and a bill to instruct that this matter be sent to the Court of Claims for adjudication.

Mr. Wakefield's story is one of compelling bravery and patriotism in the face of difficult circumstances. The service that Harold Wakefield performed on behalf of the U.S. Government should make us all proud.

Mr. Wakefield first came to Alaska in 1950. In the early 1970's, more than a decade ago, he had a well paying, highly responsible managerial position. He had a growing family and found Alaska to be the ideal location to raise his children.

In 1972, Mr. Wakefield's father passed away and Wakefield took over the family's boat shop. A year later, a customer came to that shop and offered to sell an expensive diesel marine engine. Mr. Wakefield had just recently read in the local newspaper that a flat bed truck containing a number of new snow machines and this same diesel engine had been hijacked. Rather than simply saying "no" to the offer to purchase stolen property, Wakefield said he would think about it and then proceeded to the Federal Bureau of Investigation to report the incident.

During the meeting with the FBI, Mr. Wakefield was asked if he would help recover the stolen engine. Despite the potential danger involved, he agreed. At the request of the FBI, Wakefield contacted the individual who offered him the engine and indicated he might be willing to make a purchase if the price was right. With that, the FBI placed a wiretap on Mr. Wakefield's telephone. Meanwhile, the FBI was unsuccessful in getting a search warrant. To continue the investigation, the FBI needed Wakefield to become further involved with the sting operation. The Bureau asked that Wakefield meet with the criminals and work out a deal.

At a restaurant in Anchorage, Mr. Wakefield met with an individual who later was identified as Allen Wayne Hurley, the leader of the Alaska chapter of the Hell's Angels. An agreement was made on the purchase of the stolen engine. The FBI now knew who was behind the hijacking and Mr. Wakefield could have left the case at this point. He had done more than his civic duty required. However, the FBI asked that he again become personally involved in getting the stolen property back by purchasing the engine for $10,000.

Under these pressures, the character of Henry Wakefield shown through. He found himself intimately involved with an investigation that could have cost more than mere time and inconvenience. He had to consider that the person he was dealing with was the leader of the Hell's Angels. Not only was Mr. Wakefield risking his life, his family was placed in danger with his increasing involvement in this operation.

Remarkably, Mr. Wakefield did not back down. Instead he decided to go forward with the set-up. The engine was purchased and Wayne Hurley was arrested.

With their leader facing trial, the Hell's Angels began intimidating the Wakefields. They terrorized Mr. Wakefield's widowed mother. Mr. Wakefield was forced to move her to California. Of course, Mr. Wakefield was also in danger. To change his appearance, he shaved off his beard and had his hair cut. He slept with a loaded gun by the bed and had a gun in the family cars. The house was wired with alarms and Wakefield and his wife took turns staying awake at night to make sure the family was protected.

Trying to avoid the danger, Mr. Wakefield decided to go to Costa Rica for 1 year with his wife and four daughters. He returned to Alaska only to testify at Hurley's trial and then went back to his family in Central America. His plan was to return to Alaska and reestablish his life after this event had quieted down and it would be safe to come home.

The family left Anchorage for Costa Rica in December of 1974. Mr. Wakefield returned to Alaska secretly in April of 1975 for the trial. Upon arriving at the Anchorage International Airport, Wakefield was told by the FBI and U.S. Attorney's office that Hurley had taken out a contract on his life—one large enough to attract a professional hit-man from out-of-State. In fact, the FBI brought up a special agent to claim fulfillment of the contract so that Hurley and his gang would believe Mr. Wakefield was dead. The agent gave the Hell's Angels forged evidence to show that Wakefield had been killed.

Proceeding under a great deal of secrecy and security, Wakefield testified against the leader of the Hell's Angels. During the time he was in Anchorage, Wakefield was under the witness protection program. Hurley was convicted and Mr. Wakefield immediately left for his family in Costa Rica.

And there this story should have ended, with Mr. Wakefield returning to Alaska shortly after the trial and continuing his career and raising his family. However, it was not to be. Three days after being convicted, Hurley overpowered two guards and escaped from the Anchorage jail. The U.S. Marshal's Office contacted Mr. Wakefield and told him it was not safe to return to Alaska. Because of the network of Hell's Angels across the United States, there was no place in this country where Wakefield and his family would be truly safe. The Marshal's Office was confident that Hurley would be recaptured shortly. Unfortunately, the prediction was wrong. Hurley eluded law enforcement officers throughout the Pacific coast for over 8 years, until August 1984 when he was finally captured in Bellingham, WA, with over $400,000 worth of marijuana and sophisticated growing equipment. Last fall Alaska's most wanted fugitive was returned to Anchorage and finally sentenced for the 1973 crime. He was given 5 years in Federal prison.

During the 9 years between Hurley's escape and recapture, Mr. Wakefield was running out of funds in Costa Rica and was forced to return to the United States. He and his family lived in Alabama for 1 year and then moved to Florida. He could not work full time because he was unable to give a complete employment history and so was unable to get a responsible position.

Through these years of moving about and making ends meet with part-time jobs, the Wakefields kept in close contact with the Marshal's Office in both Anchorage and Florida. Finally in 1982, 7 years after he testified against Hurley, the U.S. Marshal gave Mr. Wakefield the go-ahead to return home to Alaska.

During this entire time, Mr. Wakefield received no money of any kind from the U.S. Government except $25 for testifying before the grand jury and reimbursement for his airplane ticket when he returned to Anchorage for the trial.

Mr. President, early on, Mr. Wakefield turned down permanent witness protection because he did not want to change his name and permanently move from Alaska. Additionally, he was told that Hurley would be captured and imprisoned in a short period of time. With "20/20" hindsight, perhaps Wakefield should have chosen witness protection. The rules of the Justice Department do not permit retroactive application of the witness protection program. Mr. Wakefield, who has lost thousands of dollars because he helped the Government, now has no recourse through normal governmental channels to recover his losses. Therefore, his last resort is this private relief measure that I am introducing today.

The merits of Mr. Wakefield's claim should be adjudicated by the Court of Claims, which will assess his monetary loss. For all that Henry Wakefield has gone through these past years on behalf of his country, we should at least provide him an opportunity to present his claim before the only remaining tribunal that can provide relief. ●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

NATIONAL SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President this year, the week of May 5-11 has been designated "National Small Business Week;" 1985 marks the 21st year our Nation has acknowledged the contributions and achievements of small businesses throughout the country.

National Small Business Week is a very special week—special because it affords small businesses the recognition they deserve as the backbone of our Nation's economy. With this in mind, I would like to take a few moments to reflect on the vital contributions small businesses have provided in maintaining our country's economy as the world's leader.

This year there are over 15 million businesses in the United States; 98 percent of these are considered small businesses.

Between 1982 and 1983 the number of people employed by small businesses increased 2.6 percent. This represents almost twice the rate of increase in employment for large businesses.

The number of new jobs created by small business in 1981 and 1982 was 2,650,000. The small business sector is by far the largest creator of jobs in our economy.

Small business has afforded many minority and women entrepreneurs the opportunity to bring into reality their desire for economic freedom. From 1983 to 1984 the number of women who owned their own business increased 5.1 percent from 2,440,000 to 2,566,000. The number of minorities who owned their own business increased 10.3 percent from 570,000 to 629,000 during that same period.

Small businesses have also been instrumental in my own State of Michigan in putting people back to work. In 1984, small businesses provided over 1.5 million people with employment. This represents nearly 50 percent of Michigan's total employment.

By understanding the vital function small businesses play in our country, it is clear that small business will continue to provide our Nation with the growth and economic well-being needed in the decades ahead.

I am most pleased at this time to note that Mr. Patrick Thompson, president of Trans-Matic Manufacturing Co., located in Holland, has been selected the Michigan "Small Business Persons of the Year" by the U.S. Small Business Administration. Mr. Thompson started Trans-Matic Manufacturing in 1968 with two employees and sales of $51,000. Today, Trans-Matic Manufacturing is considered a leader in the application of high speed transfer presses, and employs over 80 people with sales of $8 million. Also of special note, the employees of Trans-Matic Manufacturing earned nearly $5,000 in profit-sharing bonuses last year, and Trans-Matic has shown an increase of 200 percent in productivity the last 10 years. This is a direct result of Mr. Thompson's strong belief in participative management.

Mr. Thompson, in addition to managing a successful business, is also active in civic affairs. He is a member of the board of directors of the Holland Education Foundation and was chairperson for the 1984 Hope College annual community fund drive. I congratulate Mr. Thompson for his achievement, and all of the employees at Trans-Matic Manufacturing who share this award through their dedication.

I would also like to take this opportunity to recognize several small business advocates in Michigan, who are being honored for providing a vast amount of time, energy, and expertise to Michigan small businesses in an effort to create a successful small business environment.

Mr. David T. Harrison, senior vice president of the First American Bank of Kalamazoo, is the "Financial Services Advocate" of the year. Mr. Harrison is one of the founders and the first president of the Kalamazoo Small Business Development Corp., and has taken an active role in responding to the financial needs of small businesses in Kalamazoo. Mr. Harrison was also a leader in implementing First America's Certified Lenders Program and Cooperating Bank Program with the SBA.

Mr. Edward M. Parks, managing partner of the Plante & Moran CPA firm in Southfield, is the "Accountant Advocate" of the year. Mr. Parks' dedication to small business has led to many innovative programs within Plante & Moran designed to assist small businesses. He has also given his strong support and encouragement to the staff of Plante & Moran to provide voluntary assistance to numerous associations, chambers of commerce, and other groups that directly assist small businesses.

Ms. Martha Mertz, president of the E&D Corp. located in Okemos, is the "Woman-In-Business Advocate of the Year." She also serves as president of the Lansing Regional Chamber of Commerce, through which she initiated an aggressive program designed to encourage women to participate in the chamber. This program resulted in an increase in women membership from 46 to 256 in just a few short years. She has a longstanding commitment to community involvement and created the Athena Award to focus community awareness on the contribution of business women to the local economy.

Mr. Wayne A. Curto, president of Pocketsavers, a cooperative direct mail company which he started in 1979, is the "Veteran Advocate of the Year." Mr. Curto has unselfishly given his time and expertise to other veterans and small business owners by participating in veterans business conferences, and local small business programs. He is a member of eight chambers of commerce in addition to managing Pocketsavers, which employs a full-time staff of 24, and has 23 independent contractors.

Mr. Larry Leatherwood, liaison officer with the Michigan Department of Transportation, is the "Minority Advocate of the Year." Mr. Leatherwood has exhibited a long and outstanding commitment to providing assistance to minority business. He is a founder and current president of the Minority Technology Council of Michigan. In his past position as director of the Division of Minority Business Enterprise within the Michigan Department of Commerce, he was responsible for providing assistance to over 2,000 clients through the department's program of assisting minority firms. In his current position, Mr. Leatherwood has been responsible for a significant increase in the number of minority- and women-owned business with the Michigan Department of Transportation.

Mr. Jack Hogan, news director of WZZM-TV-13, in Grand Rapids, is the "Media Advocate of the Year." Mr. Hogan has shown through his weekly "Success" feature for the station's regular newscast, that local small businesses can have a position and beneficial effect on their community, and has motivated others to start or expand their own businesses.

Mr. Chad C. Frost, chairman of the board of Frost, Inc., and president of Amprotect, Inc., is the "Innovation Advocate of the Year." Mr. Frost is another who has given his time, knowledge, and experience to helping other small business owners. He is a member of the board of the Michigan Technology Council, and chairman of the board of the West Michigan Technology Council. Mr. Frost is recognized as an expert on leading edge technologies and has spoken to public and private organizations on how these technologies can be applied to business.

The men and women I have spoken to here today have provided strong leadership throughout Michigan's small business community. They deserve our praise and admiration for serving as an example not just to Michigan business owners, but to small business owners throughout our country. These leaders have shown that small business is ready, willing, and able to adjust to and meet the challenges of our changing economy. I am extremely pleased to have been able to bring before you today their accomplishments, and the key role small business plays in Michigan.●

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 64—NATIONAL CORRECTIONAL OFFICERS WEEK

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor the joint resolution introduced by my Banking Committee colleague, Senator RIEGLE, to designate the week of May 5, 1985, as "National Correctional Officers Week." These officers supervise the hundreds of thousands of inmates housed in our Nation's jails, prisons, and other detention centers. They must do so under circumstances of serious overcrowding and tension that make their job even more difficult. I have visited many of these institutions, and I can only marvel at the professionalism of our correctional officers.

We ask much more of these brave men and women than that they merely keep order. We ask them to work with all inmates, even the most dangerous, to give them the opportunity to become productive and responsible citizens again.

I am pleased to cosponsor this joint resolution to accord those who undertake these most difficult and dangerous responsibilities the recognition and appreciation they deserve. I urge my colleagues to pass this joint resolution unanimously.●

HOWE MILITARY SCHOOL CELEBRATES ITS CENTENNIAL

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, to survive 100 years, from 1884 to 1984, as a private secondary school is no easy feat. To survive 100 years as a private secondary school with a commitment to excellence and high moral values, and a widely recognized superb reputation for educating young adults is an even greater feat. Yet, Howe Military School in Howe, IN, has done just that and has still flourished over the years.

Howe Military School has been celebrating its centennial throughout this current school year, 1984–85, and certainly deserves such an ongoing acknowledgement of the school's achievements and the achievements of its graduates. Howe Military School has graduated over the years hundreds of young Americans with superb academic backgrounds, high personal standards, and a strong sense of patriotism. Howe embodies what private education is and should be. Its superintendent, General Scott, its faculty, board of trustees, alumni, and supporters are dedicated to providing the students a foundation based on the principles that guided the creation of our Nation.

Howe Military School has always provided its students with a traditional education and has never swerved from its path when other secondary schools were trying to make their students happy by adding all sorts of new and experimental classes. Howe has had strong ties with the church also, which has helped guide the school and has contributed to the classic and moral education of the students.

For the most part, private schools have been able to attain greater academic quality, generate more concern for moral values, and offer a generally better disciplined classroom atmosphere than have public schools. Private education, like that offered at Howe, continues to exist because of the demand for its services. It meets the needs of a pluralistic United States because parents exercise more influence over its policies and because it combines high academic achievement and respect for traditional moral and spiritual values.

Howe Military School offers all this as well as high quality military training to its students. Ninety percent of these students go on to college or to our service academies. They are well-prepared, committed, and patriotic young adults. With the graduation of its students, Howe is performing a service to Indiana, the Midwest, and our Nation. Howe has performed this service for 100 years already. I feel certain that Howe Military School will continue to teach, lead, and prepare our youth for another 100 years.●

MARCH 1985 TRADE DEFICIT

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, it was announced Tuesday that the U.S. merchandise trade deficit was $11 billion in March. The March total was down only slightly from February's $11.4 billion figure. As a result, the deficit for the first quarter of the year is running at an annual rate of $131 billion. At this rate, the 1985 trade deficit is expected to exceed last year's record deficit of $123.3 billion. I ask that an article which appeared in today's Washington Post on the trade deficit be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

Mr. President, I continue to be amazed at the lack of concern that has been expressed over our deteriorating trade posture. We must immediately begin to reverse the harmful trend of rising imports, lack of commitment to expanding exports, and little concern for developing a coordinated trade policy. These issues, and the related issue of the competitiveness of American industry, are of the utmost importance to the economic security of our Nation.

Last year, the United States experienced a trade deficit of $123.3 billion, the ninth year in a row that we have imported more than we have exported. This is a striking reversal for a nation that has maintained a surplus in its trade with the rest of the world for most of our history as an industrial nation. In fact, this year we have become a net debtor nation for the first time since early in this century.

Although part of the enormous trade deficit is related to the high value of the dollar relative to the currency of other nations, the deteriorating trade imbalance also reflects a weakening of our competitive position in the world economy. This lack of competitiveness is not limited to the so-called sunset industries such as steel and automobiles, but is showing up in almost every sector of the American economy. Seven out of ten American high-technology sectors have lost market share since 1965, and in 1984 our trade deficit with Japan in electronics was greater than in automobiles. The declining competitive position of American industry is further documented in a recently completed report, "The President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness."

Many other industries are also experiencing serious decline due to foreign competition, much of it unfair competition as a result of subsidization and imposition of trade barriers. These industries include mining, textiles, and agriculture among others. The mining industry in New Mexico, copper, potash and uranium have experienced serious declines as mines have closed, workers have been laid off and local economies have been seriously disrupted. As a result, we must begin to rethink our trade laws and remedies against unfair trade practices.

It is true that in many cases American products do not have the same access for foreign markets as foreign products have to U.S. markets. This problem has been the focus of much discussion in the Congress and country recently, with particular reference to Japan. I strongly support any effort that results in the lowering of barriers, tariff and nontariff, to American exports to Japan. However, we must recognize that Japan accounts for only one-third of the worldwide American trade deficit. Our worldwide deficit continues to grow with all of our trading partners, including the European Economic Community and other so-called new Japans—South Korea, Taiwan and Singapore, in particular. In fact, recently these imbalances have grown even faster than our imbalance with Japan. We must open Japan's markets but we must also recognize this worldwide situation.

More than ever before we operate in a highly competitive international marketplace and world economy. International trade now accounts for over 10 percent of our gross national product. Almost 10 million American workers—several thousand in New Mexico—owe their jobs to trade related activities. Currently over 70 percent of American products now must compete with imports from countries in Europe, Asia and Latin America. A more constructive approach recognizes that the present trade imbalances are not transitory, but are likely to continue unless some action is taken. I have been active in trying to address these issues in the Senate. Specifically, I have introduced a bill, S. 450, to create a bipartisan National Trade Commission which would recommend means of developing a coherent trade policy, enhance our ability to export and improve the system of trade remedies. I am also a member of the Democratic Working Group on Trade Policy which recently issued its preliminary report on our trade policies and how to improve our trade posture.

I am also concerned that as we are now debating the budget for fiscal year 1986 we still are not recognizing the challenge and the consequences of our failure to address our trade problems. Interestingly, the budget submitted by the President and the GOP compromise plan passed by the Senate Tuesday contain spending cuts that would further exacerbate our competitiveness problems. Cuts are called for in programs to promote exports, to encourage research and development, and to improve our educational system in critical math, science, and high technology areas. We must all work to restore and enhance these programs and resist shortsighted cuts in these key areas.

The present economic summit in Bonn presents a good opportunity for this country to lead the way in bringing about a rethinking of our trade relationships. I hope it is an opportunity that will not be lost in blind adherence to the "nonpolicies" of the past which have brought us to this untenable trade deficit.

The strength and vitality of the American economy are the underpinnings of our standard of living and our security. I believe we now face a challenge to our economic leadership in the world. I also believe that once we recognize that challenge and develop a consensus on how to meet it, we will bring to bear all the ingenuity, creativity and energy that has made this country great.

TRADE DEFICIT DROPS TO $11 BILLION

(By Stuart Auerbach)

The United States' merchandise trade deficit dipped to $11 billion in March, but without significantly slowing the record pace for the year that has dragged down the economy, the Commerce Department reported yesterday.

The March total was down slightly from February's $11.4 billion figure. Nonetheless, the deficit for the first quarter of the year is running at an annual rate of $131 billion, resulting in predictions that the 1985 total will top last years record deficit of $123.3 billion.

The Commerce Department said that the picture would have been bleaker, with a damaging surge of imports, except for a sharp decline for the fourth straight month in the value of petroleum products brought into the country.

Manufactured goods—including telecommunications equipment, industrial machinery, chemicals, footwear and clothing—continued to pour into the country as total imports reached $29.3 billion, an increase of less than 1 percent over February. Petroleum imports, however, showed a 16.8 percent decrease.

"The leading indicators, down 0.2 percent in March, have been affected by the loss in market shares to foreign manufacturers," Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige said.

"The economy probably will strengthen during the current quarter, but domestic production gains will be limited by higher imports and flat export sales," he continued. "This drag on the economy would be moderated by reducing the budget deficit, lowering barriers" to American exports "and by stronger growth abroad."

House Democrats blamed an overvalued dollar for much of the trade deficit and called on the Reagan administration to convene an international monetary conference this year. The Democrats thus allied themselves with the United States' European allies—especially France—who are pressing Reagan to include monetary reform with his push at this week's economic summit for a new round of global trade talks.

Rep. Sam Gibbons (D-Fla.) said the March trade figures show "there is no turnaround" in economic problems caused by the supercharged dollar. Senate Democrats, headed by Lloyd Bentsen (D-Tex.) and a key Republican, John C. Danforth (R-Mo.), also pressed President Reagan to concentrate on correcting world currency misalignments rather than pushing for new trade talks.

Bentsen also complained that Reagan is bringing no trade specialists in his entourage to the summit, which starts Thursday in Bonn. "I think that is a serious mistake. It shows a lack of giving trade the priority and commitment that it needs. The trade deficit is not going to get turned around until the administration gets a coordinated trade policy and begins to show leadership in the White House," Bentsen said.

Baldridge said the dollar has increased 17 percent since March 1984 and 78 percent from its low point in July 1980.

A strong dollar makes American products more expensive in other countries and lowers the price of imports, making them more attractive to Americans.

The increase in overall imports was moderated by decreases in the number of automobiles shipped to the United States, especially from Japan, which most likely cut its shipments to conform to quotas that ended March 31. The Japanese government, however, announced that it will allow a 25 percent increase in automobile shipments to the United States for the next 12 months. Automobile shipments from Canada increased, indicating that the U.S. market remains firm.

Imports for the first quarter ran ahead of exports by $32.7 billion, an increase of 9 percent over last year's record pace, overwhelming slight improvements in U.S. companies' export performance.

U.S. overseas sales jumped to $18.4 billion in March, a 3.3 percent increase over February's $17.9 billion figure and 3 percent higher than the previous March. Exports had dropped by 8 percent in February for the sharpest decline in seven years. Overseas sales of aircraft and parts overcame a 13.6 decrease in exports of farm products in March.

The trade deficit with Japan, which is the United States' largest, dipped slightly in March to $3.2 billion, the lowest level since December and $1 billion less than February. The United States also recorded trade deficits of $2.1 billion with Canada, $1.7 billion with Western Europe and $1.3 billion with Taiwan.●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with my intention to see that such information is available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the notifications which have been received. Any portion which is classified information has been deleted for publication, but is available to Senators in the office of the Foreign Relations Committee, room SD-423.

The notifications follow:

POLICY JUSTIFICATION

Saudi Arabia—Design and Construction Services

The Government of Saudi Arabia has requested an extension of an existing case to provide design and construction services of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers (USACE) in connection with the Saudi Arabian Army's Ordnance Corps (SAAOC) Logistics System, including engineering planning assistance, USACE sponsored SAAOC technical orientation visits to CONUS agencies and installations, technical service contracts, financial services and commercial procurement including construction from 26 July 1985 through 25 July 1986 with an option from an additional year. The total cost is estimated to be $450 million.

This sale is consistent with the stated U.S. policy of assisting friendly nations to provide for their own defense by allowing the transfer of reasonable amounts of defense articles and services. It will demonstrate the continuing willingness of the United States to support the Saudi Arabian effort to improve the security of the country through moderization of its forces. In a regional context, enhancement of the defensive capabilities of Saudi Arabia will also contribute to overall Middle East security.

This case will extend for one year, and provide an option for an additional year, the services of the USACE to continue the modernization of the SAAOC logistics system initiated in 1972.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

There will be no prime contractor for this transaction. The USACE is the principal organization to implement provisions of this case.

Implementation of this sale will not require the assignment of any additional U.S. Government personnel or contractor representatives to Saudi Arabia.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, April 30, 1985.

Since most of the essential elements of this proposed sale are to remain classified, we will not notify the news media.

Sincerely,

GLENN A. RUDD,
Acting Director.

S. 1048—THE ANTIFRAUDULENT ADOPTION PRACTICES ACT OF 1985

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, yesterday, I joined with my distinguished colleague from Alabama, Senator DENTON, in introducing the Antifraudlent Adoption Practices Act of 1985, S. 1048. I joined with my colleague as an original cosponsor of that legislation.

I have read reports about a small group of unlicensed independent adoption brokers that may have defrauded nearly 40 couples of up to $7,000 apiece by promising to find them adoptable babies.

Allegations of deceptive adoptive practices by this group have been made by couples in at least 20 States—from Hawaii to Pennsylvania. And if the accused brokers are to be believed, the actual number of fraudulent agreements may be as high as 400. One of the serious allegations stemming from these reports is the charge that pregnant women are smuggled into the United States as a way of circumventing immigration requirements relating to adoption.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, the seamy scenario I have described may only represent the tip of the iceberg in the largely unregulated world of international and interstate adoption. A reveiw of recent adoption statistics points to this unfortunate conclusion. Last year, according to the National Committee for Adoption, an estimated 2 million American couples were waiting to adopt children. Of these, only 60,000 were able to obtain a child. Foreign and interstate placements account for nearly 14 percent of reported adoptions—we have no reliable estimates of unreported independent placements.

As an adoptive parent I sympathize with the desire of all prospective parents to bring a child into their homes. And I believe that States, whose jurisdiction over family law is well established, should continue to exercise primary responsibility for regulation of adoption practices. However, because a significant number of adoptions occur outside the reach of State statute, the Federal Government has a responsibility to insure against deliberate and unconscionable deception of vulnerable children and their families—both natural and adoptive.

Under the provisions of our bill, the Federal Government would work in concert with States to supplement—and not supplant—State adoption statutes. This much needed measure would make fraudulent practices by an adoption service that operates between States or internationally a Federal crime punishable by a fine of up to $10,000 and imprisonment of up to 5 years. Enactment of this bill will provide access to the Federal courts for both prospective parents and pregnant mothers. In addition, this legislation will direct the Secretary of Health and Human Services to join with States in reviewing all adoption legislation to determine whether improvements in existing law should be made as a means of better insuring that adoptive children and their parents are protected.

[1] As defined in Section 47(6) of the Arms Export Control Act.

I hope my colleagues will agree with the objective of this bill and join us to secure its swift passage.●

ACID RAIN

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of S. 283, introduced by my distinguished colleague, Senator MITCHELL. I am pleased to be added as a cosponsor of this bill.

In the past, I have indicated my support for a similar bill, S. 52, which is also pending before the Committee on Environment and Public Works, and I continue to support that bill. In cosponsoring both S. 283 and S. 52, I want to make it clear that I am ready to back any reasonable proposal which will substantially reduce sulfur dioxide emissions. We simply cannot tolerate any further delays in reducing this pollution. I am tired of proposals which suggest we should postpone action until we have more studies or more discussions. This is a problem that is going to cost us valuable, irreplaceable resources if we fail to act quickly.

Acid rain is a growing concern in the State of New York, not only for its detrimental effects on aquatic chemistry and life, but also for the increasing appearance of problems with our forests, crops, and even our drinking water.

As I regularly visit the beautiful Adirondack region, I have been particularly concerned over the damage in that area. As a rule, the Adirondack lakes do not have enough natural buffering capacity to neutralize the detrimental effects of acid rain. The combined effect of the damage to the forests and the loss of sport fisheries has cost the region millions of dollars in lost tourism. Acid rain is a growing disaster. It has even scarred the Statue of Liberty.

Mr. President, I do not believe, as some would propose, that we should simply study this problem over and over before taking action. Without prompt action, this problem will grow. A lake can take only so much acid; after a point, it may lose its fish and plant life forever. Some of our lakes have passed that point, while others are drawing dangerously close. Once acid rain has laid waste a forest, it takes decades for the trees to grow back.

Worse yet, acid rain may do harm we are only starting to understand. If enough acid gets into a reservoir, it might release aluminum and mercury from the bottom, with serious implications for our drinking water supplies. Acid might also leak lead from the pipes in water delivery systems. The health effects are still unknown, but the possibilities are disturbing.

The single greatest source of acid precipitation is believed to be sulfur in coal burned by electric utilities. Nationally, emissions of sulfur dioxide are running at about 25 million tons per year.

S. 283 would require sulfur dioxide emissions to be reduced by 10 million tons per year by 1994. I want to make it clear that I believe that those responsible for this pollution should bear the costs of these reductions. The message is simple: we have to cut down on the air pollution that causes acid rain—and we have to make the polluters pay.

The citizens of New York are extremely concerned about acid rain. The overwhelming majority of New Yorkers who have contacted me on this issue have indicated that they support strong acid rain legislation—even if it means slightly higher utility bills. They do not want to see Congress delay action through more hearings. They do not want to see Congress delay action through more discussions. They do not want to see us authorize more studies which do nothing to actually accomplish a reduction in emissions. They want a solid, strong acid rain control program, and they want it now.●

ADVANCE NOTIFICATION—PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon receipt of such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Pursuant to an informal understanding, the Department of Defense has agreed to provide the committee with a preliminary notification 20 days before transmittal of the official notification. The official notification will be printed in the RECORD in accordance with previous practice.

I wish to inform Members of the Senate that such a notification has been received.

Interested Senators may inquire as to the details of this advance notification at the office of the Committee on Foreign Relations, room SD 423.

The notification follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, April 30, 1985.

In reply refer to: I-02275/85ct

Dr. M. GRAEME BANNERMAN,
Deputy Staff Director, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR DR. BANNERMAN: By letter dated 18 February 1976, the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, indicated that you would be advised of possible transmittals to Congress of information as required by Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act. At the instruction of the Department of State, I wish to provide the following advance notification.

The Department of State is considering an offer to a Northeast Asian country for major defense equipment tentatively estimated to cost $14 million or more.

Sincerely,

GLENN A. RUDD,
Acting Director.●

HARVESTING THE TAX CODE

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, the current tax structure in our country provides for agricultural tax shelters that permit high-income investors to shelter nonfarm income in agricultural investments. This not only adds to our agricultural surpluses, but also costs our Government billions of dollars every year in lost tax revenues.

To remedy this situation, my esteemed colleague from South Dakota, Senator JAMES ABDNOR, has introduced legislation to limit to the national median family income ($23,600) the amount of off-farm income that can be used to offset a farm loss. This will help to make "farming the Tax Code" substantially less attractive to those in search of tax shelters. I commend Senator ABDNOR on having taken the leadership here in the Senate in addressing this problem in our tax structure and have added my name as cosponsor of Senate bill 244.

Recently, Newsweek magazine published an article on Senator ABDNOR's involvement with this issue. I ask that this article, "Harvesting the Tax Code" from the March 18 edition of Newsweek be inserted into the RECORD.

[From Newsweek, Mar. 18, 1985]

HARVESTING THE TAX CODE

The need for shelter is almost as basic as the need for food, and some enterprising humans have figured out a way to satisfy both. The past 20 years have produced a bumper crop of agricultural tax shelters, generally designed to shelter nonfarm income with farming losses. But in the midst of the deep agricultural depression, there is a growing belief that farming the tax code is making matters worse. Republican Sen. James Abdnor of South Dakota argues that the phenomenon "adds to our surplus-production problems," drives up land prices—and may even be accelerating soil erosion by encouraging the planting of marginal lands.

As a result, Abdnor is one of several farm-belt legislators leading a drive to make agricultural shelters less attractive. In terms of deals marketed to investors, such shelters amounted to less than .5 percent of the $18.6 billion in limited partnerships sold in 1984, according to tax-shelter consultants Robert A. Stanger & Co. But the various types of agricultural shelters cut a wide swath through farming. In 1981 farm net income reported to the Internal Revenue Service totaled $8.5 billion; farm tax and operating losses equaled $16.3 billion.

Most of those losses were incurred by full-time farmers aiming to make a profit, but a large portion were reported by several kinds of tax-code farmers. An estimated 60 percent of farm operators also earn income off the farm—and they may incur tax losses in farming that they apply against their nonfarm income, sometimes leaving them with little or no tax liability. But there are, also, high-income earners—many of them professionals or celebrities—who live on or own farms that may produce as little as $1,000 in sales each year. These "gentlemen farmers" often use tax benefits from farming—such as investment tax credits or depreciation of farm equipment and livestock—to shelter nonfarm income; if they live on a farm, they may be able to deduct almost all their living expenses and generate huge tax losses. Finally, there are also passive tax-shelter investors who simply buy into an agricultural partnership, drawing many of the same tax benefits they would get from other forms of shelters.

Tax-code farming may produce a number of distortions in the economics of agriculture. Take, for example, the development of the "supercow"—a superior milk producer that is artificially induced to produce dozens of calf embryos a year. Because cows are eligible for investment tax credits, rapid depreciation and other tax benefits, these are bought and sold frequently, bidding up prices to stratospheric levels. And because they and their offspring are so good at producing milk, some dairy farmers complain that they are exacebating the nation's huge dairy surplus. "Is it fair? Hell, no," says George Morgan, a Walton, N.Y., dairy farmer who manages cows for investors. "But [I don't believe] the current tax system [is] fair at all."

Some economists think critics of tax-code farming overstate its ills. The current overproduction of cow embryos should be self-correcting; if the embryos "aren't very marketable," says Allen Bock, a professor of agricultural law at the University of Illinois, the business should shrink. Moreover, government dairy price supports are far more responsible for the dairy surplus than any number of supercows. Nonetheless, Abdnor has introduced a bill to limit to $23,600 the amount of off-farm income that any individual can offset with farm losses. The bill is considered a long shot, but if it passes, it could send many absentee farmers looking for shelter somewhere else.●

WINNIE MANDELA—A VOICE OF CONSCIENCE FROM SOUTH AFRICA

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would like to call my colleagues' attention to an article published in today's edition of USA Today. "We're Tired of Slavery; We Fight for Freedom" is a profoundly moving account of an interview with Winnie Mandela in Johannesburg.

At age 50, Winnie Mandela has spent almost half her life banned, detained, or banished. She has raised her children alone since her husband, Nelson Mandela, the leader of the African National Congress, was imprisoned in 1963 and sentenced to life imprisonment for leadership in the effort to achieve equal justice for all the people of South Africa.

Today in South Africa, black families are denied the most basic human rights by their Government—the right of children to grow up with their parents, the right of man and wife to be together, the right to make a home for those we love. Winnie Mandela's ordeal over the past two decades has been a continuing testament to the harsh injustices inflicted on the black majority by the racist South African regime and the abhorrent system of apartheid. Her courage and enduring commitment to justice are a symbol of the aspirations of the oppressed majority for justice and equal rights.

In the interview in USA Today, Winnie Mandela eloquently reminds us why it is as true in South Africa now as it was in America a generation ago that separate can not be equal. Her courage and unbroken spirit make her an inspiration to people all over the world who care about freedom and human rights. I ask that the full text of her interview, "We're Tired of Slavery; We Fight for Freedom," be printed in the RECORD.

The text follows:

[From the USA Today, May 2, 1985]

WE'RE TIRED OF SLAVERY; WE FIGHT FOR FREEDOM

USA TODAY. Your husband, Nelson Mandela, has been in jail for more than 20 years. How can he still be a respected leader of the African National Congress, which has been banned by the South African government?

MANDELA. Nelson is the embodiment of the aspirations of the people of this country. In him one sees the future of South Africa as embodied in the Freedom Charter, the document that was drawn by the people of this country in 1955. The Freedom Charter is the black man's political bible, the future constitution of this country. Mandela is the African National Congress—Mandela in exile and all the leaders in exile.

USA TODAY. You have been banned for 23 years. What does it mean to be banned?

MANDELA. To be banned means your house is literally turned into a prison by simply a stroke of a pen. I am under house arrest as well, which means I'm confined to my premises from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. the following day. I cannot receive anyone during the house arrest hours. I can only see one person at a time. At any time in my life for the past 23 years, I have only been allowed to communicate with one person at a time.

USA TODAY. Why?

MANDELA. More than one is regarded by the racist regime as a social gathering. I am prevented from attending social gatherings. I may not enter school premises. I may not enter any institution. I may not enter any building where there are printing machines because I cannot disseminate any literature. A banning order means complete isolation from the reality of life.

USA TODAY. How has it affected your family?

MANDELA. I have never been able to play my role as a mother. I haven't been able to give my children any kind of normal life. One of the greatest prides of any parent, when a child reaches school-going age, is the pride of taking your child to the school the first time and introducing your child to the teacher.

USA TODAY. Have you ever been charged with a crime?

MANDELA. Never, with the exception of the time I was jailed and held incommunicado, held without trial in solitary confinement for 18 months. That was in 1969. I was charged with furthering the aims of communism, a charge that couldn't stick even in their courts, a charge that was thrown out by their own judges.

USA TODAY. What is the charge against Nelson Mandela?

MANDELA. High treason.

USA TODAY. The leaders of the ANC were all jailed for high treason in 1962?

MANDELA. Yes. None of those men has spilled an ounce of blood. None of those men was ever involved in any acts of terrorism. Those men have never lifted up a finger against any white man. Those men are sentenced to life imprisonment for political sabotage.

USA TODAY. There are over 20 million blacks in South Africa. If there could be an election by some miracle, how many people would vote for representatives of the African National Congress?

MANDELA. It could count on the masses of this country, with the exception of those who are the government's imposed leaders. It is difficult to give you statistics, but the majority of this country's blacks are members of the African National Congress.

USA TODAY. How do you respond to charges that you're really involving yourself in terrorism, not defense?

MANDELA. This is what they think they can continue deceiving the world into believing, that they are dealing here with a band of terrorists. The African National Congress never embarked on violence of their own accord. It launched the military arm in answer to the government's violence. It was the only honorable way, the only channel that was left after the government's total refusal to enter into any aspect of negotiation with the masses of this land.

USA TODAY. You oppose violence?

MANDELA. No sane man could take up arms, could resort to violence when there was an alternative. No sane man can embark on a course of violence for violence's sake. When Mandela delivered his speech the day he was sentenced to life imprisonment with the rest of the leadership, he said they wanted to guide the inevitable violence they saw coming. They wanted to contain it. They wanted to avoid loss of blood. Acts of sabotage were all over the country. People were beginning to express their anger in uncontrolled acts of violence, which led to mass deaths. The decision to embark on the armed struggle was not an easy one for the African National Congress. Our military arm of the ANC is named for the spear of the nation and that is the only tool we have had to defend ourselves with from the moment the white settlers arrived in this country.

USA TODAY. What was your reaction to the killing of the unarmed black protesters not long ago in the Port Elizabeth area?

MANDELA. That is the violence that continues to be the order of the day. The African National Congress leadership warned the government that with apartheid as it was and with the racist regime passing more and more racist laws, that could only lead to more polarization between the races, that the laws were such that the people's anger could only be expressed by fighting a government that was not prepared for anything else other than violence.

USA TODAY. Why does that particular area see so much unrest?

MANDELA. Most of the trade unions are based there. The government continues to give an impression that it can divorce the black worker from the African National Congress.

USA TODAY. By forbidding involvement in politics?

MANDELA. Yes. For instance, one hears this common language from Pretoria that the worker should concern himself with his labor. But there is no aspect of a black man's life that is not political. The black worker doesn't have the same status as the white worker. How can the black worker not be part of the political stream when his very existence and position there in the factory is determined by apartheid laws, when he can never supervise a white. No matter how skilled or educated he is, he cannot supervise a white illiterate. How can the black worker not be a politician?

USA TODAY. What do you mean a politician?

MANDELA. Your blackness is a commitment. Your own existence, the fact that you live in an area that is designated for you at the stroke of a white man who is governing you. I cannot live where I please. I cannot work where I please. I am in exile. My people cannot sell their labor as they please. The country is bled dry economically today by a racist government that refuses to dismantle apartheid. In this country, a government has to do each item—no matter how infinitesimal—four times. For instance, schooling: There has to be a school for whites, a school for Indians, a school for coloreds, and a school for blacks.

USA TODAY. What should opponents of apartheid around the world do?

MANDELA. The West refuses to understand what we mean by saying leave us alone. We are tired of being well-fed slaves. We want to fight for our freedom on empty bellies. Stop sustaining and maintaining apartheid. Stop financing apartheid. Again, the white man prescribes for us. He tells us we will suffer, as if we have not been suffering.

USA TODAY. Should U.S. firms stop investing in South Africa?

MANDELA. The country is as it continues today because of the apartheid laws. Had it not been for the fact that it continues to be financed by the West, we probably would have been 10 years in advance today in our fight for our liberation. This country has continued to bleed the international community to finance apartheid. This is what the West does not want to understand. Disinvestment is the only other peaceful measure we know of. All other avenues have been closed to us. That is why we say stop supplying a racist regime with arms that kill us, stop giving them money to finance apartheid that is killing our people. We, too, thirst for the dignity of ourselves, and for that dignity we are prepared to go hungry.

USA TODAY. Why did your husband refuse the government's offer of freedom?

MANDELA. You do not jail men for life for their ideological beliefs and still insult them by offering release under exactly the same conditions that drove them to prison 23 years ago. Mandela is not in prison because he is fighting for his own individual freedom. Mandela is in prison, and the rest of the leaders are in prison, for the freedom of the people of this country.

USA TODAY. What happens now? Is this the beginning of a bloody revolution?

MANDELA. It is not the beginning; it is the protracted revolution. It started the day the Afrikaner closed the chapter of negotiation with the people of this country, the day the Afrikaner jailed the leadership. It began then.●

COSPONSORING S. 925—TO WITHDRAW MOST-FAVORED-NATION STATUS FROM THE ILLEGAL GOVERNMENT OF AFGHANISTAN

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor legislation, S. 925, introduced by my good friend, the senior Senator from New Hampshire and the chairman of the Congressional Task Force on Afghanistan. S. 925 would withdraw most-favored-nation status from the illegal Government of Afghanistan. Such action will represent a commitment on behalf of the United States to stand fully behind the freedom fighters seeking to remove the Karmal regime. It seems only consistent that, while we support the Afghan freedom fighters, we should withdraw most-favored-nation status from the Soviet puppet regime which has consciously accompliced Soviet attempts to obliterate the Afghan people.

This war has been primarily fought by the Soviet Army. After 5 years of brutal fighting, 115,000 Soviet soldiers are stationed within Afghanistan, while another 35,000 to 40,000 are on the Soviet border available at a moment's notice. Due to the Soviet's scorched earth policy and indiscriminate bombings, over 4 million Afghans have either been killed or forced to leave their country. Those Afghans who are brave enough to stay and resist Soviet domination are subject to antipersonnel mines, indiscriminate bombing, and chemical warfare. The Soviets have even restored to dropping toy bombs or "butterflies" from planes by the thousands. Hundreds of children roam Pakistani refugee camps devoid of hands and feet, thanks to these toys.

Against the might and brutality of the Red Army, the Mujahidin, or Afghan freedom fighters, have not relented. For the Soviets, they have turned the quick annexation once hoped for into a quagmire. In combat, they have killed between 8,000 and 9,000 Soviet soldiers and have inflicted 25,000 Soviet casualties. The Soviet Union can claim only 10 to 15 percent of this nation under its undisputed control. In short, the Afghan people will continue to fight until the Soviet oppressors have been removed from their soil. The United States must applaud this effort and must continually and consistently take actions to aid the freedom fighters.

On the first day of the 99th Congress, I introduced a resolution, Senate Resolution 34, which would turn the spotlight of world attention to the tragedy in Afghanistan. My resolution condemns the Soviets for their 5 years of military occupation and subjugation of the Afghan people and calls upon the President to supply the Afghan freedom fighters with all needed medical, military, and food aid. I believe Senate Resolution 34 and S. 925 depict the true sense of this Congress on the brutal atrocities of the Soviets toward the people of Afghanistan, and the need of the United States to fully support those Afghans seeking to repel the Soviet Army from Afghan sovereign lands. As the leader of the free world, the United States must support the quest for freedom worldwide, especially in Afghanistan.

Mr. President, I urge the adoption of both of these bills.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

SECURITIES SAFETY AND SOUNDNESS ACT OF 1985

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, in case my colleagues did not have an opportunity to read the most recent edition of Business Week, I would like to share with them an excerpt from the magazine's cover story on executive pay. The story shows that not only is T. Boone Pickens one of the savviest entrepreneurs to hire Wall Street, but also that he is one of the most highly compensated executives in corporate America. As a matter of fact, Pickens ranked No. 1 with a total compensation package of $22 million annually.

I insert this story in the RECORD, not because of his salary. I do not know if he is worth it or not. But any notion that a takeover of a company by Pickens will automatically benefit stockholders should be dispelled by this article. I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

DOES BOONE PICKENS PRACTICE WHAT HE PREACHES?

Mesa Petroleum Co. Chairman T. Boone Pickens Jr. had just finished another sermon on the "sunset" oil industry and its wastrel leaders. It was a well-worn speech on how big oil companies are liquidating themselves and should share their huge cash flows with stockholders.

The meeting was packed with independent oilmen in awe of the messenger of doom for Cities Service, Gulf, Phillips—and now perhaps Unocal. Still, there was one doubting Thomas. From back in the crowd, he asked: "What are the Mesa shareholders getting out of all of this?"

The question follows Pickens everywhere these days, as Mesa's stock trades at about $17 a share, up almost 30% from early 1984, when it looked as if Gulf Oil Corp. might escape from Mesa and leave it with big losses. But it is down from $22 last December and is only half of the 1981 high of $34.

LOWEST PROFITS

Meanwhile, Pickens has emerged as the highest-paid executive of any public company, earning $22.8 million last year. "He's gone too far," chides one Mesa alumnus. Pickens retorts that he is getting his just rewards: "I've never questioned a corporate executive making money if he makes money for stockholders, and I make a lot of stockholders."

The facts, though don't support his claim. Even though Mesa posted a 34.2% return on equity in 1984, it yielded only a 7% return to shareholders in the past three years. Pickens' millions made him the CEO who produced the lowest profits and shareholder gains for his pay (table, page 81).

Mesa's board awarded Pickens a salary and bonus of $4.2 million in 1984—more than he earned in the prior three years combined. And after Mesa "lost" Gulf to Chevron for a profit of some $700 million, Mesa Director Cyril Wagner Jr. proposed that Pickens and a few aides get a $20 million bonus. It was approved in "deferred compensation units" that could be used to play along with Mesa in future takeover attempts. Pickens' share: $18.6 million.

Mesa's board also made Pickens a gift of an additional $7.6 million in "loan" chits for speculating—at no risk—on future deals. This allowed him to earn $5.5 million, or almost 7% of Mesa's profits, on the forced restructuring of Phillips Petroleum Co. earlier this year. Thus, Pickens is already a shoo-in to make 1985's best-paid list.

His defenders note that besides being his own investment banker, Pickens assumed hands-on responsibility for oil and gas exploration at Mesa after cleaning house last year. "If it weren't for Boone Pickens there would be no Mesa," says Wales H. Madden Jr., an Amarillo (Tex.) lawyer and Mesa director. "He's worth every penny he's paid." Presumably so are Mesa's directors, whose 1985 pay has been doubled to $50,000, plus expenses.

Madden admits that a shareholder suit is possible over Pickens' pay. If so, it will be the second. The first was over the options for 6 million shares at $11.50 awarded to Pickens in 1979. Pickens settled the suit by taking only 4.8 million options, which still would bring him up to 9% of the company, and are worth about $30 million.

Despite $1 billion in gains since 1981 from losing out to higher bidders in each of its forays, Mesa has neither upped its meager dividend nor bought back its stock to split the booty with shareholders. Mesa's dividend payout last year totaled $14 million—far less than Pickens' pay.

Nor has Mesa replaced its oil and gas reserves through exploration. Last year it resorted to buying back reserves in a tender offer for the Mesa Royalty Trust it had spun off to shareholders in 1979. Pickens was the largest unit-holder in the trust. From a high of $45 per unit in 1980, the trust had sunk to $29. Mesa offered $35.

"I don't know any other CEO that has done as much for shareholders as I have," says Pickens. Even though Mesa's stock price has slumped, Pickens contends that's just Wall Street's fretting over his takeover attack against Unocal. Moreover, Mesa still sells at about 90% of appraised breakup value—twice the ratio for most major oils.

GOING DOWNHILL

The real payoff for Mesa shareholders may be just around the corner, says Alan L. Edgar, an oil analyst at Schneider, Bernet & Hickman Inc. in Dallas. If Pickens can wrest control of Unocal for $54 a share, or about $9 billion, he can then take Mesa private by borrowing on the remainder of Unocal's assets. Pickens himself has recently been a big buyer of Mesa stock. If he loses Unocal to a higher bidder, the profit could still allow a Mesa leveraged buyout.

Such speculation is not new and is small consolation to longtime shareholders. Says an ex-Mesa officer. "His credibility is really going downhill."●

TRI-INDUSTRIES, INC., SMALL BUSINESS CONTRACTOR OF THE YEAR

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I would like to share with the Senate the outstanding achievement of a Terre Haute, IN, manufacturer which will be honored for its record as the top Federal procurement prime contractor in a six-State region. The firm, Tri-Industies Inc., was selected as the outstanding prime contractor in the Small Business Administration's Region V which encompasses Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio and Wisconsin. I ask that my remarks be printed in full:

The remarks follow:

INDIANA MANUFACTURER SELECTED REGIONAL SMALL BUSINESS CONTRACTOR OF THE YEAR

Tri-Industries, Inc., a Terre Haute, Indiana, manufacturer will be honored in Terre Haute, May 3, 1985, and in Washington, D.C. next week during National Small Business Week for its outstanding record as a federal procurement prime contractor. It is indeed a joy and honor to join in the accolades due this constituent firm, which was selected by the Small Business Administration as the outstanding prime contractor in a six-state region encompassisng Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio and Wisconsin.

Tri-Industries is a precision manufacturing house of combustion components and other major components for military and commercial manufacturers of gas turbine engines. Founded in 1955 by Vernon Hux, Tri-Industries has grown from a five-man operation to a modern plant employing 200 people. Vernon Hux is a veteran of 39 years of achievement in the machine trades industry, with 34 years experience in the aerospace industry.

I toured Tri-Industries in December, 1984, and can attest to the quality management and dedicated workforce of the company. The aerospace industry has changed dramatically in the last 30 years as manufacturers and designers have sought to keep pace with advances in aerospace technology. Tri-Industries' committment to quality, service, and economy has made it an integral part of the aerospace component field and will enable it to shape the future of the aerospace industry.

In the last year, the company has invested more than $5 million in facilities and equipment, including a move to a new physical plant which doubled the firm's size. Projections call for Tri-Industries' sales to double in the next two years and employment to increase by an additional 50 percent.

Tri-Industries selection as the outstanding prime contractor in SBA's Region V and third nationally attests to the company's unmatched excellence in the design and manufacture of aerospace components. And while we pause today to congratulate Tri-Industries on their past achievements, I am convinced that the company stands ready to meet future challenges with the same commitment to excellence.●

NATIONAL DAY OF PRAYER

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, our Nation has been blessed by God as no other nation in the history of mankind. Therefore, it is fitting that the President has proclaimed today the 33d consecutive National Day of Prayer, in humble acknowledgement of the God of our Founding Fathers for his graciousness to us these past 200 years.

Observances of a National Day of Prayer date back to 1775, when the Continental Congress declared the first one. Through the succeeding decades other national days of prayer were declared from time to time until 1952, when, by joint action, the two Houses of Congress established the custom of a National Day of Prayer on annual basis. By this action, the Nation's Chief Executive was instructed to set aside one such day each year.

During the Constitutional Convention in 1783, Benjamin Franklin reminded his colleagues of the active role that the hand of divine providence had played in their struggle against tyranny. He said:

When we were sensible to danger we had daily prayer in this room for divine protection. Our prayers, Sir, were heard, and they were graciously answered * * *. And have we now forgotten that powerful Friend? Or do we imagine that we no longer need his assistance?

In 1863, during the most critical juncture of our Nation's history, Abraham Lincoln once again appealed to divine providence for His assistance when he declared a Day of Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer. He said:

It is the duty of nations, as well as of men, to own their dependence upon the overruling power of God, to confess their sins and transgressions * * * and to recognize the sublime truth, announced in the Holy Scriptures and proven by all history, that those nations only are blessed whose God is the Lord * * *.

Across the Nation today, thousands of people took 5 minutes at noon to express their thanks to God and pray for his continued blessing upon this Nation and its leaders. Quite frankly, I find this a tremendous encouragement to know that many of the people of this great country willingly took their time to do this. And I would hope that the American people would begin from this day forward to make it a daily habit to pray for their leaders, both in Washington, DC, and in their home States.

If Benjamin Franklin and Abraham Lincoln were alive today, I believe they would remind us of the importance of continuing to seek divine guidance as we address the many complex and critical issues facing our Nation today and in the days ahead of us. What we do here today, this week, this month, this year, will profoundedly affect future generations of Americans, as our past has deeply influenced us. We cannot afford to forget the blessings of our past as we seek to perform our God given responsibilities.

Mr. President, the National Day of Prayer is a truly significant day in the spiritual life of the Nation. To give my colleagues some idea of the events and observances that have occurred around the Nation this day, here is a brief summary of the activities as compiled by Mrs. Bill Bright, chairman of the National Day of Prayer Committee:

More than 20 States and over 50 cities have issued proclamations declaring May 2 a Day of Prayer.

In observance of this year's theme, "Take 5 at 12" church bells and chimes all over America will sound a national call to prayer.

As many as 58 prayer breakfast and luncheon observances will take place from Oregon to Florida and California to North Carolina.

State and local coordinators have indicated that rallies are planned on the steps of city halls in at least 15 major cities.

One mayor of a large southern city city sent a copy of his proclamation to all pastors in the city encouraging them to observe the Day of Prayer.

In Las Vegas, NV, the State coordinator has secured the donation of seven electronic billboards—reader boards—to communicate the "Take 5 at 12" challenge. They were in such strategic places as the entrance and the exit to the airport, on the main strip, a shopping mall, and a sports arena.

The Florida coordinators are hosting a dinner party for over 400 civic and religious leaders at which a State representative will be featured.

The Governor of Florida made a special 30-second and 60-second public service announcement encouraging Floridians to join in prayer for their State and Nation on May 2.

CNN, the cable news network, is featuring the National Day of Prayer on their network around the world, as is Super Station WTBS.

Untold thousands of National Day of Prayer table tent literature were printed and displayed in restaurants all over the Nation who ordered camera-ready artwork.

In Washington, DC, today construction workers will be asked to "Take 5 at 12" as they open their lunchpacks and read one of the 12,000 fliers a lunch canteen owner has placed in them.

Many small businesses are closing at noon to allow their employees to take time to pray for our Nation.

Across our Nation, executives have informed us that they are encouraging their employees to take time at noon or during the day for prayer for our country.

In California, an 85-year-old man wanted to inform his city about the Day of Prayer, so he went to the mayor and secured a proclamation. He then, at his own expense, printed 100 posters about the day and took them around to the businesses. The response from this multiracial community was so great, that he had to reprint about 1,000 more.

The Reverend Billy Graham is in Hartford, CT, today speaking to 2,000 pastors. At noon he will lead them in a time of prayer for our Nation.

The National Day of Prayer Task Force has distributed literature to over 21,000 people and organizations including almost 12,000 press release packets.

I would like to offer my thanks and encouragement to all those who took part in observing the National Day of Prayer today. At this point I would further ask unanimous consent that the President's proclamation of the National Day of Prayer be inserted into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the proclamation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL DAY OF PRAYER, 1985

(By the President of the United States of America)

A PROCLAMATION

The history of the American Nation is one of conviction in the face of tyranny, courage in the midst of turmoil and faith despite the rolls of doubt and defeatism. Throughout our 208 years of freedom, the people of the United States have drawn upon the lessons learned at the dawn of our liberty by acting "with a firm reliance on Divine Providence" and expressing gratitude for the many blessings a loving God has showered upon us.

These lessons have not been learned and honored without difficulty. During the Revolutionary War, the Continental Congress proclaimed a National Day of Prayer each year for eight years, a practice that ended with the winning of the peace in 1783. Decades later, while the Civil War raged, this observance was renewed by Abraham Lincoln. Responding to a Senate Resolution requesting the President to designate and set apart a day for prayer and humiliation, Lincoln said that "intoxicated with unbroken success, we have become too self-sufficent to feel the necessity of redeeming and preserving grace, too proud to pray to the God that made us." He then called the Nation to prayer.

Our very existence as a free Nation, then, has provided potent witness to the efficacy of prayer. Grover Cleveland, in his First Inaugural Address, said, "Above all, I know that there is a Supreme Being who rules the affairs of men and whose goodness and mercy have always followed the American people, and I know He will not turn from us now if we humbly and reverently seek His powerful aid." Franklin D. Roosevelt, in his Fourth Inaugural Address, expressed the same thought, "The Almighty God has blessed our land in many ways . . . So we pray to Him now for the vision to see our way clearly—to see the way that leads to a better life for ourselves and for all fellow men—to the achievement of His will, to peace on earth."

Today our Nation is at peace and is enjoying prosperity, but our need for prayer is even greater. We can give thanks to God for the ever-increasing abundance He has bestowed on us, and we can remember all those in our society who are in need of help, whether it be material assistance in the form of charity or simply a friendly word of encouragement. We are all God's handiwork, and it is appropriate for us as individuals and as a Nation to call to Him in prayer.

By joint resolution of the Congress approved April 17, 1952, the recognition of a particular day set aside each year as a National Day of Prayer has become a cherished national tradition. Since that time, every President has proclaimed an annual National Day of Prayer, resuming the tradition begun by the Continental Congress.

Now, therefore, I, Ronald Reagan, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim May 2, 1985, as a National Day of Prayer. I call upon the citizens of this great Nation to gather together on that day in homes and places of worship to pray, each after his or her own manner, for unity of the hearts of all mankind.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-five, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and ninth.

RONALD REAGAN.

ORDERS FOR FRIDAY, MAY 3, 1985

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 8:30 A.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, apparently there was some confusion about the earlier request. I renew the request and ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stands in recess until the hour of 8:30 a.m. on Friday, May 3, 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE ON FRIDAY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, and there was a request for the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. PROXMIRE, to be recognized on a special order not to exceed 15 minutes. Was that properly put?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection.

Mr. DOLE. Is there any further business to come before the Senate?

Mr. BYRD. No.

RECESS UNTIL 8:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the order just entered, that the Senate stand in recess until 8:30 a.m. tomorrow.

Thereupon, at 9:50 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Friday, May 3, 1985, at 8:30 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

A FARM BILL WHICH PRESERVES THE FAMILY FARM

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the long feared farm crisis is at hand. Farmers are facing the most troubling times since the Great Depression. Only with strong assistance targeted toward the family farm will they weather the current storm. That is why I am introducing today the Family Farm Survival Act of 1985.

This bill takes into account both the complexities of the modern agricultural economy and our great need to limit Government expenditures for any purpose. It sets target prices high enough that the family farmer can be assured of enough income to survive hard times, yet keeps loan rates low so that we can export as much as the world wants without overpricing our goods on world markets. It keeps expenditures down by limiting the amounts of direct payments and CCC loans given to any producer. With this bill the family farm can survive the current crisis, yet Government spending on farm programs will be kept as low as possible.

Some with little experience with agriculture scoff at the importance of the family farm to America. Let those scoffers take note: Their jobs may depend on the survival of American agriculture. The food and agricultural system in this country accounts for fully 20 percent of the gross national product. For each person employed in farming, six are employed in processing, transporting, wholesaling, or other occupations dependent on supplies from the farms.

American consumers have grown accustomed to a steady stream of products on supermarket shelves. They take for granted dependable prices, and dependable supplies. They may not realize that this is due largely to a diversified system of family farms stretching across the continent, and of Government farm policies designed to dampen price swings and insure supplies. Government policies toward agriculture must be cognizant of enormous budget deficits, and so restrain spending on farm programs. But they must be cognizant as well of the necessity to maintain a structure of viable family farms in the country. Without price supports family farms will be absorbed into ever-increasing conglomerate farms; not only will a way of life die, but so will the most productive and dependable agricultural system the world has ever known.

INCOME PROTECTION THROUGH PRODUCER PAYMENTS

My legislation is designed to increase the incomes of family farmers, while removing any possible interference with worldwide market forces. It will:

Set target prices close to the estimated level of production costs on the commodities covered (wheat, corn, other feed grains).

For wheat, the target price in fiscal year 1986, will be $5.25 a bushel, with increases of 3 percent in each succeeding year to adjust for anticipated increases in production costs. For corn, the target price will start at $3.56 a bushel in fiscal year 1986, with 3-percent increases. Target prices of other feed grains will be proportional to corn.

We need to increase target prices to give farmers enough income to stay on the land. USDA recently reported that:

> Between 20 and 30 percent of all commercial farmers (sales over $100,000) are facing financially stressful conditions, requiring decisive steps to improve cash flow and profits.

It may be even worse in States like Iowa and Nebraska. If these farmers fail the distress will ripple out: Land value will decrease (it dropped 8 percent in North Dakota in 1984), putting more country banks in jeopardy as their collateral dries up. Surviving farmers will have less ability to take out debt for a new crop year, for their collateral will be diminished. This scenario is already all too true, and accounts for the fact that there are fewer people farming in North Dakota than ever before. We need to stop the ripples from spreading further.

A few years ago farmers thought their income problems were solved by growing export markets. No longer. The export balloon was punctured by an overvalued dollar and stagnant international demand: USDA projects wheat exports of 37 million metric tons this fiscal year, the lowest since 1979. The result will be declining wheat prices, according to forecasting firms; $3.50 a bushel today, $3.40 a bushel in 1986, $3.38 a bushel in 1987.

The other side of the ledger is just as bleak. While income has stagnated, costs have skyrocketed. Family farmers are now paying for the tight money monetary policies which have caused interest costs to rise 76 percent from 1979 to 1983, in North Dakota.

Farmers are paying today for fiscal policies which created an overvalued dollar, and monetary policies which drove up interest rates. Many cannot survive with current Government policies. The target prices in this bill will provide an adequate income to the family farmer no matter what happens to market prices over the next 4 years. No longer will they be sacrificial lambs at the altar of misguided economic policies.

PAYMENT LIMITATIONS

This bill will limit deficiency payments to the first 12,000 bushels of wheat or the first 15,000 bushels of corn produced by a farmer, and limit nonrecourse CCC loans to $150,000 per farmer.

The price support system today badly skews Government benefits toward the biggest producers, who need Government assistance the least. In 1982 the top 10 percent of wheatgrowers—large and even giant farms, with wheat crops covering from 1 thousand to many thousands of acres—received 43 percent of Government assistance from the crop programs. On the other hand the smallest half of wheatgrowers received only 11 percent of Government help. The rich got richer in the wheat program, and it was no different for growers of corn, rice, cotton, or any of the other crops covered by farm programs.

The distribution of CCC loans, along with the associated costs, is even more skewed. There is no limit to CCC loans today, and so the largest 10 percent of wheatgrowers got fully half of CCC outlays in 1982. The giant wheat farms—those with over 2,500 acres in wheat production, received almost a quarter of benefits from the CCC loan program, even though they were just 1 percent of the farmers participating in the program.

This maldistribution is the direct result of Government policy. Current farm programs are commodity based: the more you produce, the more you get. Commodity-based income supports get too much to giant producers, who need it least, and too little to mid-sized farmers, who need it most.

The enormous budget deficits—more a threat to the family farmer, perhaps, than anything nature has invented—compell us to limit Government spending. We must carefully examine all programs, including farm programs, targeting assistance to those who need help, rather than those whose outstretched hands are the biggest.

INCREASED EXPORT COMPETITIVENESS

This bill will set commodity loan rates at 75 percent of the average of annual market prices over the past 5 years, not including the highest and lowest years.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Setting loan rates in this manner approximates current market prices. There has been much recent discussion on the adverse impact of higher loan rates on the farm economy. Some maintain that loan rates set a floor on the prices of U.S. commodities, permitting little flexibility when trading in international markets and letting other exporters know far in advance the price of U.S. goods. I think the overvalued dollar hinders our exports far more than loan rates higher than market prices; nonetheless, we must remove all possible barriers to our exports. With higher target prices the lower loan rates will do no disservice to family farmers, and it may do them some good.

HOW WILL THE PROGRAM WORK FOR MOST FAMILY FARMERS?

How will this bill affect producers? Consider wheat farmers. In 1986, according to forecasts, the price of wheat will be $3.40 a bushel. That would be the income received by farmers with no Government farm program, or with the type of purely free market farm program as espoused by the administration.

The target price for wheat in this bill is $5.25 in 1986. The projected deficiency payment would then be $1.85 a bushel. Farmers could receive this payment for the first 12,000 bushels they harvested.

Two-thirds of all wheat growers who participated in crop programs nationwide had 333 acres or less in wheat in 1982. The full production from farms such as these would be covered by a 12,000-bushel limit on direct payments, assuming a 30-bushel yield per acre. In North Dakota the average wheat farm harvested 335 acres of wheat in 1982. This would be right at the limit of direct payments. Farmers producing at the 12,000-bushel limit would receive—if the forecasted price is accurate—$22,200 as a deficiency payment. Farmers producing less would receive the full $1.85 deficiency payment on each bushel. Larger farms could harvest more wheat, but their entire harvest would not be fully covered by deficiency payments. A 2,000-acre farm, with 1,000 acres in wheat, could not get more than the maximum $22,000 deficiency payment received by the average farmer.

This is hardly a windfall for family farmers, but it gives some breathing room. Farmers could produce as much as they wanted. Government assistance, though, would stop at 12,000 bushels (for wheat), targeted at the midsized farm. Larger producers would have to listen to signals from the marketplace when deciding how much to plant, and if exports grew again they could sell by the carload.

Computer analyses of this farm program done by the Congressional Research Service indicate that it would work best with a 10 to 15 percent set-aside. My bill leaves the set-aside to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, so that he can make year-by-year adjustments reflecting the previous crop year's weather and market conditions and economic forecasts for the coming year.

This bill is not a panacea, nor is it engraved in concrete. It is a starting point, intended to focus debate on whether or not we intend to help the family farm survive these troubled times.

Make no mistake: The issue in the 1985 farm bill is the survival of the midsized family farm. The Senate majority leader once said:

Farm bills satisfy everyone but those who live in the cities, those who live in the small towns and those who live in the country.

He might change his mind when he sees this bill. By targeting a limited amount of Government expenditures at midsized farms, and by removing the interference of the loan rate with market forces, we could satisfy everyone but the giant producers. I would be satisfied with that.●

WOLF BLITZER ON U.S. AID TO ETHIOPIAN JEWS

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, as the Ethiopian disaster continues, it will do our spirits good to take note of the good work—both noble and careful—done by American and Israeli officials to plan and carry forward the airlift of Jewish refugees. These Ethiopian natives have been permanently spared further depredations by the Dergue, Colonel Mengistu's Marxist-Leninist junta. And their rescue comes in an appropriate year—the 40th since the war and the Holocaust were brought to an end in Europe.

Recently, Wolf Blitzer, the Jerusalem Post's outstanding Washington correspondent, offered an analysis of how the airlift plans developed in the political circles of our capital. Some excerpts from his article follow. I believe they show, in this anniversary year, that in fact we have not forgotten.

JEWS IN ETHIOPIA: U.S. CARED THIS TIME

(By Wolf Blitzer)

U.S. involvement was dramatically underscored in recent weeks by the C-130 military transport airlift of hundreds of stranded Ethiopian Jews from camps in the Sudan to Israel. This was a combined State Department-Pentagon-Central Intelligence Agency operation that was actively promoted by Vice President Bush and personally authorized by President Reagan. It was extremely sensitive, both diplomatically and militarily. But it was only the culmination of a critical and extremely supportive U.S. involvement with Israel and others for more than a year to bring Ethiopian Jews to Israel.

The use of U.S. planes was necessitated after Israel's chartering of Belgian planes was suspended in early January. That followed Israel's ill-faced confirmation of an airlift of Ethiopian Jews to Israel.

There have been several important developments over the past 40 years that have resulted in this remarkable change of governmental attitude in Washington. They suggest that lessons of the Holocaust have indeed been learned.

First, Israel exists today as a guaranteed haven for all Jewish refugees. This after all, is Israel's raison d'etre. There was no such country in the 1930s and 1940s willing to accept masses of European Jews. Six million died, one of out every three Jews then living in the world.

In a very practical way, the fact that Israel is willing to welcome Ethiopian Jewish refugees has made U.S. governmental cooperation in facilitating their rescue so much easier.

Second, the U.S. Jewish community has become significantly more self-confident and politically powerful over the past half-century. Jewish organizational clout today is an important force in Washington—something that the executive branch of the U.S. government cannot ignore.

In the past several months, in this regard, several young Jewish foreign-service officers and political appointees in the State Department's bureaus of African Affairs, Refugee Affairs, Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, and elsewhere were personally very active in making sure that the U.S. was doing everything possible to help save Ethiopian Jews. They did so in the best professional manner—quietly, behind the scenes, with no fanfare or publicity. They would not let the issue die.

They, of course, had the blessings of Messrs. Reagan and Bush and Secretary of State George Shultz. They also had the critical support of many non-Jewish U.S. diplomats serving in Washington and out in the field, especially in Ethiopia and the Sudan. Some, motivated strictly by humanitarian concerns, took courageous steps to save Ethiopian Jews. Their full stories—in the best tradition of Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg who personally saved many Hungarian Jews during World War II—will be told one day.

There have been allies in this current struggle. There were, for instance, many direct representations from Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill urging a more assertive U.S. approach toward the Ethiopian Jewry issue. This congressional involvement was significant in reinforcing the Reagan administration's general policy orientation.

In the 1930s there was no similar informal network of influential U.S. politicians and bureaucrats—Jews and non-Jews alike—willing to take the lead in saving Europe's Jews. The end result was very painful. Times fortunately, have changed.●

UNITED NATIONS FINANCES SWAPO TERRORISTS WITH U.S. TAX DOLLARS

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, frustrated with the 6-year delay in implementation of U.N. Resolution 435, Namibia's duly elected internal political leaders recently asked South Africa to grant Namibia full powers of local self-government pending ultimate independence in accordance with U.N. Resolution 435. South Africa agreed, and a transitional government of Namibia with full autonomy will take over all powers of local government in June.

Since 1920 Namibia has been administered by the Republic of South Africa pursuant to a League of Nations mandate.

In 1978 the United States, along with Great Britain, France, West Germany and Canada, all of whom were then U.N. Security Council members, adopted a plan for independence for Namibia in U.N. Resolution 435. Namibia is the last colonial area in Africa.

Since 1978 the Soviet-surrogate government in Angola, Namibia's northern neighbor, has blocked the independence plan embodied in U.N. Security Council Resolution 435. Angola permits a Soviet-backed terrorist organization known as SWAPO to maintain bases in southern Angola—while SWAPO continues to try to seize control of Namibia by force before an election under U.N. Resolution 435. And the United Nations continues to designate SWAPO as the "sole" representative of the Namibian people—a demonstration of partiality for one group which makes a fair and free election under U.N. supervision an impossibility. Finally, Angola refuses to remove the 35,000 Cuban combat troops the Soviet-puppet government in Angola relies on to keep it in power.

The transitional government and the Multiparty Conference Leaders of Namibia are pledged to support U.N. Resolution 435. They emphasize that the transitional government is not a step toward a unilateral declaration of independence. The only independence plan is U.N. Resolution 435 which can be implemented as soon as: First, all Cuban troops leave Angola, as demanded by President Reagan and South Africa, and second, the United Nations establishes its impartiality by recognizing and treating equally all political parties in Namibia—not just Soviet-backed SWAPO.

The U.S. national security stake in a truly free and independent Namibia is enormous. We cannot let the Soviets gain control of the Namibian gateway to strategic minerals in southern Africa upon which the United States is 100 percent import-dependent. The United States cannot risk being subjected the Soviet diplomatic "blackmail" through threats to disrupt our access to the only free world sources of platinum, chromium, and a host of similar critical and strategic minerals.

The following article describes a part of the problem:

UNITED NATIONS FINANCES SWAPO TERRORISTS WITH U.S. TAX DOLLARS

Namibia (South West Africa), is a country generally unknown to Americans despite the important U.S. national defense interests involved there. Few American taxpayers are aware that they may be helping finance their own destruction to the extent the United Nations diverts U.S. contributions to finance pro-Soviet terrorists.

Operating from bases in Soviet-controlled Angola with the help of 25,000 Cuban soldiers, the Soviet-backed South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) is trying to take over Namibia (South West Africa) by terrorist violence, in the same way a Soviet-backed "puppet" seized control of Angola in 1975.

Why? Namibia has the largest uranium mine in the world, vast resources of copper, diamonds, tin, gold and oil, and its western coast deep water port can harbor Soviet nuclear submarines to bisect the oil and mineral lifeline from the Persian Gulf to the U.S. and NATO countries. (28,000 ships a year follow this route).

If the SWAPO guerrillas can drag Namibia behind the "iron curtain," the U.S. loses another ally in the mineral "resource war" and Russia makes a huge gain in its campaign to control the strategic minerals in southern Africa.

The U.S. Congress annually appropriates $1 billion hard-earned U.S. tax dollars to the U.N.—25 percent of the total U.S. budget.

The U.N. General Assembly, described by the Washington Post as "an institutional outrage," a "moral swamp" which operates much of the time by the "mob rule of its Third World majority in close alliance with its Communist bloc," gives SWAPO $24 million a year, and millions more to other Soviet-sponsored terrorists, such as the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), Cuban guerrillas in Angola and the Caribbean, and elsewhere.●

THE PRESIDENT'S TRIP

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to discuss my reasons for voting against House Concurrent Resolution 130, concerning the President's trip to West Germany.

I firmly believe that it is not a legitimate function of this body to be telling the President where he should or should not go on state visits. In their wisdom, our Founding Fathers skillfully crafted the Constitution to ensure the preeminent role of President in the conduct of U.S. foreign affairs. Court cases have reaffirmed the leading role of the President in this area.

Members of Congress would be outraged if the President or the State Department attempted to alter the agendas of our factfinding trips abroad. In the same manner, Congress must not attempt to dictate to the President the itinerary of his trip.

The President's gesture of reconciliation, coming 40 years after the end of World War II, does not mean that our Nation has forgotten the heinous crimes of the Holocaust. Auschwitz, Dachau, and the other concentration camps will always be remembered by the American people, and serve as stark reminders of man's inhumanity to man.

I commend the President's decision to visit the site of the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp. The suffering of the Jews will never be forgotten or repeated.

Today, West Germany is one of our strongest allies. While we will never forget the Holocaust, we cannot revisit the sins of the fathers on the sons. Let us continue to foster the friendship that has developed between our two nations in the postwar era.●

FEDERAL EDUCATION PROGRAM WORKS

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, it has unfortunately become fashionable for many people to talk only of the shortcomings in Government programs, and to ignore the very real successes that often occur when Government is employed correctly by society to deal with serious social problems. One program which I have found to be very successful in my own district, and in the Nation as a whole, is the chapter I program, formerly known as title I, which provides educational assistance to students, particularly in the reading and arithmetic areas.

Recently, in the April 18 issue of the Walpole Times Mary H. Sheridan, chapter I director of the Walpole public schools, published a useful reminder of the degree to which this program has been so helpful to many young people.

I ask that Mary Sheridan's article be reprinted here, in recognition of the good work that has been done in the Walpole schools on this subject, and as a reminder of the importance that properly run Government programs can play in the lives of many who are in need of assistance.

[From the Walpole Times, Apr. 18, 1985]

CHAPTER I HAS 20 YEAR HISTORY OF SUCCESS IN WALPOLE

(By Mary H. Sheridan)

The week of April 8 has been designated as Chapter I Birthday Week in Massachusetts. The legislation that made this federal program possible was signed April 15, 1965 by President Lyndon Johnson. Since then Chapter 1, formerly known as Title I, has given millions of students in our country a chance for success in the basic skills.

Chapter I began in Walpole at the Stone School (now the Town Hall) as a five-week summer program in 1967. Frank Farley, director of guidance, was the director of the "Individualized Subskills Learning Program."

In 1968 Harold Varney, principal of Old Post Road School, became the Title I Director until 1980 when the summer program was discontinued in favor of a school year program. During those 12 years the number of children served increased from 80 to 125, and the budget increased from $18,000 to $41,000. In the summer of 1973 the length of the program, then held at Fisher School, was increased from five to six weeks in order to give students additional help. The student to teacher ratio was approximately 5 to 1, and high school and college students served as aides to the teachers. Emphasis was on reading and arithmetic skills.

During the last summer of the program children from prekindergarten through grade 3 attended with 22 teachers and 17 teacher-aides on the staff, including classroom teachers, a reading specialist, a learning disabilities teacher, a speech and language teacher, a guidance counselor and a media specialist.

The 1979 evaluation of Dr. Paul H. Todesco, an outside evaluator from the Bureau of Educational Field Services at Northeastern University, was typical of previous evaluations:

"It is my sincere belief that the 1979 Title I Summer Program in Walpole was very succesful. The program offered a meaningful and evolutionary program for the students who attended. The program shows an effort to humanize the curriculum more effectively by integrating math, reading, art, science, and physical education. At the same time, it had available ample support staff to treat specific student needs. I was, and am, impressed with the quality of leadership and instruction shown in this program. The quality of the aides gives me great hope for the future. I highly recommend the continued support of this model program."

The school year program now serves about 160 students in Walpole's elementary and middle schools, as well as students at Blessed Sacrament School who are residents of Walpole. This year's grant of $80,000 has provided funds for supplementary instruction in reading, math and writing. Students are given individualized instruction, in small groups by the Chapter I staff who work closely with the classroom teachers to diagnose, coordinate and plan a program that best meets the needs of these pupils. In 1985 we continue to offer the quality of program began in 1967 and applauded by Dr. Todesco.

Mary H. Sheridan is Chapter I director in the Walpole Public Schools.●

A TRIBUTE TO SARAH McLENDON

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, April 22, the University of Missouri School of Journalism paid a deserved and, I believe overdue, tribute to one of this Nation's most effective journalists, Sarah McLendon.

On the concluding day of its annual journalism week program at Columbia, MO, the school presented its annual honor medals to seven outstanding leaders in their fields. One of the 1985 Missouri honor medals was presented Monday evening to Mrs. McLendon.

I should point out to the House that these medals, coming from one of the Nation's leading institutions in the field of journalism education, are marks of great distinction. They are awarded only to men and women who have made great and lasting contributions to the field in which they work and to the people they serve.

Sarah McLendon, a correspondent who is familiar to many of us in this House because of her long experience in covering Washington, is a native of my State of Texas—and as a Texan, I am proud to salute her. She is also a graduate of the institution which honored her, one of a number of Missouri journalism graduates who have compiled distinguished records here in Washington as well as many other parts of the Nation and the world.

The Missouri medal winners are not cited for one specific story or article. This is a prize given on the basis of contributions to journalism over many years of dedicated service.

In Sarah McLendon's case, this award was based on her record of enterprise and independence in coverage of national and regional news over her years in the Capital—for her courage in asking the hard questions that had to be asked for the sake of her readers in Texas and elsewhere—and for her skill and diligence in digging out the news that matters from the White House, the Congress, and the rest of the Washington scene. And beyond that, I believe Sarah McLendon was also being honored for her determined and continuing work over many years to fight for the rights of women in journalism—a fight that has produced some impressive results.

Mr. Speaker, I want to add my congratulations to Sarah McLendon for this latest public evidence of the high regard in which she and her work are held. But I also want to congratulate the University of Missouri's Journalism School for having the perception to know a distinguished journalist when it sees one.

WHAT SANDINISTAS FEAR IS DEMOCRACY

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to praise the efforts of outgoing Assistant Secretary of State Tony Motley for the outstanding job he did during his 2 years as head of the Latin American Bureau. In my dealings with Secretary Motley, whether in direct conversation with him or through his appearances before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, I was always impressed with his knowledge, his candor and his grasp of the vital issues affecting United States-Latin American relations.

In particular, Secretary Motley's leadership was significant for his contribution to the peace process in Central America and the search for an approach which provides for economic and social justice as well as for the strengthening and growth of democracy.

Secretary Motley's performance was especially noteworthy for his pursuit of the protection of U.S. national security interests as affected by our relations with Nicaragua. His incisive analysis of the problems and threat posed by the Sandinista regime demands the attention of all of us concerned about peace and stability in the Western Hemisphere. Shortly before he announced his resignation as Assistant Secretary, Tony Motley wrote an article which appeared in the April 23 Los Angeles Times, entitled "What Sandinistas Fear is Democracy." I urge my colleagues to read this thought-provoking analysis.

The article follows:

WHAT SANDINISTAS FEAR IS DEMOCRACY

(By Langhorne A. Motley)

President Reagan's call for dialogue in Nicaragua brought a quick rejection from Nicaraguan Foreign Ministers Miguel d'Escoto, who described it this way: "We are being told, 'Drop dead or I'll shoot you.'" Before dismissing this retort as cynical bombast, we should look closely at the underlying assumption in D'Escoto's statement. He is equating democracy with death.

The President's proposal is based on the call by the unified Nicaraguan opposition for a cease-fire. Does that threaten death?

The opposition offered to recognize Daniel Ortega as president of Nicaragua. Does that say "Drop dead?"

The unified opposition asked for a plebiscite to be held to ratify the last election, and pledged to abide by the results. Does that sound fatal?

The opposition wants a dialogue mediated by the Roman Catholic Church. They want the nations of the region to serve as guarantors of legal rights. They want these nations to ensure that press censorship is lifted and freedom of expression and assembly are not impeded. They want something that they were denied in the last election, a chance to compete fairly. Does that sound unreasonable?

Many international observers called this proposal a fair offer. However, the Sandinistas responded by calling anyone associated with the plan a Somocista, and by rounding up democratic opposition advocates in Nicaragua on trumped-up charges. The Sandinistas refused to receive the envoy from the group, Arturo Cruz, a one-time member of the Sandinistas' junta and their first ambassador to Washington.

Clearly it was the Sandinistas who have been saying "Drop dead" to a good-faith effort to peacefully resolve the conflict in that country. Instead of accepting the offer to talk, they are forcibly moving 65,000 to 100,000 campesinos out of northern Nicaragua and are burning villages to prevent a return to the area. They apparently are preparing to free-fire zones in which they would do more than just say "Drop dead." They apparently are preparing to kill anyone or anything that happens to wander through these areas.

The refusal of the Sandinistas to talk and their preparation for a "final offensive" prompted Reagan to propose his peace plan. He asked the opposition to extend its offer to negotiate for 60 days. He asked the Sandinistas to accept the cease-fire offer and begin talks. He asked Congress to give him the authority to provide humanitarian aid to the resistance forces, and pledged not to supply military aid for at least 60 days—no matter how the Sandinistas responded.

The international community reacted positively, especially the presidents of Nicaragua's neighbor nations. The leaders of the nations involved in the broader Contadora negotiations called it a "forward step" that was "fully consistent with the contadora process," and urged the Sandinistas to consider dialogue. The newly elected democratic leaders in Uruguay and Argentina have also praised this proposal.

Still the Sandinistas refuse to talk.

If the Sandinistas indeed see peace as a threat and democracy as death, they cannot expect to continue receiving support or sympathy from democratic states. Even today many of those who previously supported them have refused to defend their actions. Many Americans who previously doubted the prudence of military aid to the democratic resistance have been baffled and disgusted by the policies of the Sandinistas.

This tide of opinion turned on the Sandinistas because they rejected a reasonable offer. Their refusal to talk reinforces the theory that only pressure has led to changes in the policies of the Sandinistas. They refused to participate in regional talks until the insurgency began. They refused to sign the Contadora Group's 21-point document of objectives until the insurgents began increasing the pressure. Once Congress limited U.S. aid, the Sandinistas refused to consider any additional changes in what was clearly a draft treaty.

They could, of course, prove this theory wrong and initiate talks without seeming to be forced into them. That is what many, including well-meaning members of Congress and the presidents of several Latin nations, would have them do.

However, this stalemate is no excuse for avoiding the challenge of making peace. Reagan has accepted this challenge. He has asked Congress to give him the flexibility that can lead to a negotiated peace in Nicaragua. As the President has said: This is not a call for the overthrow of the Sandinistas; it is a call for democracy. Despite the fears of Miguel d'Escoto, democracy is life, not death.●

WILBUR COHEN ON SOCIAL SECURITY

HON. JAMES R. JONES

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, August 14, 1985, marks the 50th anniversary of passage of Social Security into law by President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, making a reality of retirement security for our Nation's senior citizens.

My good friend, Wilbur J. Cohen, who served at that time in FDR's Cabinet Committee on Economic Security, and later as Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare in the Johnson administration, and who now serves as professor at the LBJ School of Public Affairs, at the University of Texas, Austin, has written an OpEd piece for the April 5, 1985, issue of the Austin (TX) American Statesman, to honor this occasion.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would like to have Mr. Cohen's article printed in the Extensions of Remarks, so that my colleagues can have the benefit of Mr. Cohen's wisdom.

At a time when the stability of Social Security Trust Fund is being questioned by some, and when our Nation's younger citizens wonder if Social Security will be there for them when they retire, I think Wilbur Cohen's article makes for good reading. I recommend it highly.

[From the Austin (TX) American Statesman, Apr. 5, 1985]

AFTER 50 YEARS, SOCIAL SECURITY HERE TO STAY

(By Wilbur J. Cohen)

Fifty years ago today the first step took place in the congressional legislative process which eventually made Social Security to reality: the House Committee on Ways and Means reported a Social Security bill favorably to the full House of Representatives.

I was a young research assistant whose assignment was to monitor congressional developments for President Franklin D. Roosevelt's Cabinet Committee on Economic Security which drafted the basic program. I followed the bill through Congress until it was signed by FDR on Aug. 14, 1935.

The Social Security Act then was—and now is—more than an old age program. Today it includes Old Age, Survivors and Disability Insurance and Medicare; unemployment insurance, maternal and child health, crippled children and child welfare services, Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Supplemental Security Income (SSI) program, Medicaid (Title XIX) and the Social Services Program (Title XX).

Old Age, Survivors and Disability Insurance is what most people think of as "social security." It is the largest program in the Social Security Act—37 million persons are currently drawing benefits—and is an essential part of the safety net in our nation. Without it there would be some 15 million more persons in the poverty group today and many more persons on welfare.

This program has helped millions of American of all ages. Many Americans have forgotten what it would be like without it. Most young people do not realize what their financial obligations would be to their parents and grandparents if there were no Social Security. Social Security has proved to be effective, enduring and beneficial in protecting the American family and our economic system.

But there is still a great deal of public anxiety over Social Security's future.

Many young people today do not believe that Social Security will be here to pay off when they retire. I do not share such "gloom and doom" about our government and our economy.

Social Security has been paid for the past 44 years and based on that experience, I believe that Congress will see to it that it continues to pay out for the indefinite future.

Many persons believe that the Social Security program is bankrupt. That is just not so.

President Reagan's actuaries and key Cabinet officers have estimated that the case benefits are adequately funded as far as the eye can see. Yet, there are many persons who do not know this.

Young persons who are currently contributing to Social Security frequently question whether they are getting their money's worth.

My answer is an unequivocable "yes." Here are the reasons why:

The disability and survivors insurance protection is especially valuable to younger persons and families. The four different types of protection offer a family protection package: disability, life (survivors) insurance, old age benefits and Medicare. And administrative costs are only 1.5 percent of the benefits.

One distinctive feature of Social Security which very few private plans contain is that the benefits are increased each year if the cost of living goes up 3 percent or more. This feature alone will serve to give young contributors their money's worth.

Some critics in 1935 said the plan was unconstitutional and would "destroy old age retirement systems set up by private industries."

Neither of these predictions became true.

I believe that many of the worries about the future difficulties of Social Security will not become true.

Today, we hear it repeated that because the number of beneficiaries will grow in relation to the number of worker contributors, the program will be financially unsound 25 to 50 years from now. This is not the whole picture.

These fears do not take into account future increases in productivity per worker and future increases in the gross national product which will keep Social Security financially viable.

Social Security is here to stay because it provides a floor of protection on which individuals and private plans can build greater protection.

We need, however, a better safety net especially for the millions of women and children now living in poverty. We need a comprehensive nationwide health policy which will cover the millions now without health insurance protection.

I am proud of having had a small role over 50 years in building and preserving a program that has helped in reducing the need for welfare and in undergirding our free market economy for those who would otherwise fall through it.●

COAST GUARD CONSOLIDATION PLAN: A MISTAKE

HON. F. JAMES SENSENBRENNER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce into the record testimony I made today before the House Appropriations Subcommittee. This proposed consolidation of search and rescue missions on the Great Lakes by the U.S. Coast Guard is inequitable and unsafe for citizens and the maritime industry of this region.

I will present testimony today on the proposed Great Lakes consolidation plan. I represent the Ninth District of Wisconsin, which is one of the States affected by this proposal.

The fiscal year 1986 budget request from the U.S. Coast Guard includes the closing of nine search and rescue stations on the Great Lakes. One such station slated for closure is located in Sheboygan, WI. In addition, this plan calls for the curtailment of four additional search and rescue stations in the Great Lakes region. The Coast Guard proposes to save $5 million through these actions. These closures are the only ones planned throughout the entire United States, and I strongly oppose this plan to single out the Great Lakes area.

In 1981, the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Subcommittee on the Coast Guard and Navigation conducted a comprehensive series of hearings into all phases of Coast Guard operations and procedures. That effort resulted in a report—House Report 97-355—which concluded, "a serious imbalance exists between the Coast Guard responsibilities and the resources available to the service." This imbalance was cited as causing a steady deterioration in the ability to carry out the Coast Guard's missions effectively. The proposed consolidation plan will encourage further decline in the Coast Guard's search and rescue services in the Great Lakes, services which are the Coast Guard's most important mission.

This plan eliminates the nine Coast Guard stations on the Great Lakes regardless of the consequences to the safety of persons who rely on their maritime services. The effects on safety, specifically the additional time it will take for the Coast Guard to arrive on the scene of an emergency, is my deepest concern about this proposal. Let me use the Sheboygan station as an example.

According to the statistical analysis compiled by the U.S. Coast Guard here in Washington, DC, it is estimated the Sheboygan Coast Guard's average response time is 28 minutes. With the closing of this station, the average response time will increase to 84 minutes. Computer generated statistics aside, my office contacted the Sheboygan Coast Guard station and received the following information. Responding to specific questions, they estimated their average response time to be between 10 and 15 minutes, once they are underway. Though Rear Adm. Arnold Danielson, commander of the 9th Coast Guard District, states that the response time to the Sheboygan area by either the Milwaukee or Two Rivers station would be within the 2 hour acceptable standard response limit, common sense tells us the response time will be increased by hazardous seas and inclement weather. While the Coast Guard may find a response time of up to 2 hours time acceptable, I do not. Hypothermia could be a major problem. Very few human beings can survive 1 to 2 hours submersion in the frigid waters of Lake Michigan, whose average temperature during the boating season is about 50 degrees.

Last year, the Sheboygan Coast Guard personnel responded to 107 requests. Only six were routine requests for towing. The other 101 requests were classified as severe, moderate, or slight situations. While a severe situation is self-explanatory, let me define the other two terms. A moderate situation occurs when a threat to life or property exists and you can assume the personnel and/or property would have been seriously injured or lost had action not been taken. A slight situation is where no threat to life or property exists. However, had action not been taken, the situation may have degenerated into a threat to life or property. I would like to quote a woman from Sheboygan, Charlene Shircel, because she has a point worth considering. She said, "Out of the 100-plus calls the Sheboygan Coast Guard made in 1984, only a small percentage was considered life or property threatening because the Coast Guard got there. Who dares to guess how many situations would have been life threatening without the Coast Guard service?"

I also object to the consolidation plan because it lacks equity. We know this plan was in response to the Office of Management and Budget's budget balancing efforts. It is also my understanding that this proposal does not conform to the Coast Guard's usual practice of looking servicewide for cost savings. To target only 1 of 12 Coast Guard districts and a specific geographic region of our country is plainly unfair and unjust. It appears someone decided to cut the Coast Guard budget. The response to this order, probably from OMB was to arbitrarily close down some stations to meet budget guidelines. This was most likely the easiest way. I suggest the possibility of budget cuts agencywide which may be more difficult, but can potentially maintain the search and rescue mission.

Having said this, let me add I found it most difficult and frustrating to obtain additional information about the consolidation plan from the Coast Guard. In fact, I did not receive a response to my original request for more information until 1½ months later. To get telephone calls returned from the Coast Guard's congressional liaison office was asking for a miracle. It took an irate phone call to the Department of Transportation to accomplish this. When my staff contacted the Sheboygan Coast Guard Station, their personnel were limited to strictly giving out statistics. It is obvious those in authority have insisted on clearing any information disseminated about the plan. Could it be that those who are in charge of saving lives, within the Coast Guard, do not believe this plan is safe or equitable either?

Since statistics seem to be the name of the game in this proposal, let me cite a few more. An article in the Milwaukee Journal, stated the cuts were proposed because a Federal study concluded that the Great Lakes area had a substantial number of rescue stations, but a low number of response situations. According to the study, 25 percent of the Coast Guard rescue stations were in an area of the country with only 11 percent of all rescue cases. James Ingham, group commander of the rescue base in Milwaukee and the man with authority over 13 rescue stations on the west side of Lake Michigan argues, and rightly so, these are misleading statistics because, as Commander Ingham put it, "6 months out of the year we have ice on the lake. For half of the year we don't have any search and rescue missions." This assessment was reiterated by the minority staff on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Subcommittee on Coast Guard and Navigation. Their analysis of the search and rescue statistics showed one must assume the decision to close stations on the Great Lakes was made using annual statistics. On a per year basis, the 9th Coast Guard District does have the second lowest number of responses, excluding Hawaii, and Alaska. However, if you examine the search and rescue statistics month-by-month and evaluate the statistics for May, June, July, August, and September, the months when the Great Lakes are busiest, the statistics show the 9th Coast Guard District has the second highest number of responses behind the 2d Coast Guard District in New York.

I firmly believe the proposed Coast Guard consolidation plan is unsafe and inequitable to the maritime community of the Great Lakes region. The question you must answer is whether the $5 million saved by this plan is worth the numerous lives which will be put at risk should this plan be implemented. I, therefore, urge the subcommittee to reject the Great Lakes consolidation plan and encourage the Coast Guard to cut costs by looking for savings servicewide as well as exploring other means to reduce their budget.●

MEDICAL AND RELIGIOUS LEADERS URGE CONGRESSIONAL ACTION TO ELIMINATE HUNGER IN AMERICA

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit the following letter urging immediate congressional action to eradicate hunger in America. This letter was submitted by 265 prominent health, medical and religious leaders from across the Nation. This letter is unique in the stature and diversity of its signatories. They include deans of major medical schools and schools of public health, high level representatives of teaching hospitals and members of the Institute of Medicine, as well as leaders of Protestant, Jewish, and Catholic denominations in the United States.

The authors of this letter bring our attention to the mounting documentation of hunger and malnutrition in our Nation today. The concern of religious leaders reminds us of the women, children and unemployed who seek emergency food aid and join the long lines outside of soup kitchens and food pantries in cities and towns across the Nation. The strong representation by the professional medical associations among the signatories of this letter reminds us of the abnormally high rates of hunger and malnutrition-related disease reported in the 1980's—particularly among poor infants, children and the elderly who are most vulnerable to the consequences of even mild undernutrition.

I submit the following letter to urge my colleagues to take action this year to strengthen public and private efforts to feed the poor of this Nation:

APRIL 18, 1985.

To Congressional Leaders:

We believe there is no excuse for hunger in America.

As religious leaders and members of the health and medical professions, we call upon you to respond immediately to the present problem.

Fifteen national studies have concluded that hunger is again a serious problem in the nation. Recently, a group of prominent physicians found that hunger is worsening because of the unevenness of the economic recovery. Increasing numbers of families are standing in church soup lines. The gap between poor Americans with access to food stamps and those without grows wider.

We worry particularly about evidence linking hunger to ill health. After 20 years of decline, the infant mortality rate is levelling off. Unusually high rates of growth failure and anemia are found among poor children. Chronic diseases worsened by inadequate nutrition are seen among the elderly poor.

The commitment of a nation to feed its people is perhaps the most fundamental measure of its values. We believe that government action to assure access to adequate nutrition for all is medically wise. We believe it is fiscally responsible. And we believe it is our obligation as a people.

Bipartisan Congressional leadership virtually eliminated hunger in this nation once before. Hunger has returned, and it can be eliminated again.

We ask that you take immediate steps to eradicate hunger in America.

Sincerely yours,●

A TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM H. TOLES

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the achievements of William H. Toles. Mr. Toles is scheduled to be honored by the Friends of York College (Queens, NY) at their 11th annual buffet and cocktail party on May 8.

The honor will be in recognition of Mr. Toles' tireless support of York College and the Jamaica community. Due in part to his efforts, enrollment has grown tremendously and York College has become an integral part of the City University of New York System. His work as a board member of the Greater Jamaica Development Corporation has been instrumental in the revival of the community.

Mr. Toles' list of accomplishments are not limited to his work in the community, however. A native of Poughkeepsie, NY, he served with the North Atlantic Wing of the Air Transport Command in World War II. After the war, he played professional football for the Brooklyn Football Dodgers of the old All-American Conference.

Mr. Toles holds a master's degree in social work from Howard University. He is widely recognized for his expertise in the area of minority business development. As a corporate officer with 15 years experience at ITT Continental Baking Co., and 12 years as executive director of Settlement House, his advice is frequently sought in the fields of economic development and employment, housing, and health and welfare.

He has been associated with many causes and organizations and received many awards over the years. Mr. Toles is a past chairman of the board of directors and Queens Borough director of the New York Urban League. He is also a past lieutenant governor of the N.Y. District of the Kiwanis International. He has also served prominently with the NAACP, the Queensboro Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and the New York State Division of the Human Rights Advisory Board, to name just a few.

The Queens community is fortunate to have Mr. Toles among its residents. The Friends of York College have indeed chosen a worthy recipient for their tribute.●

UNICEF REMEMBERED

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Virginia M. Gray, former executive director of the Citizens Committee for UNICEF, recently published her memoirs, entitled: "Love is Not Enough: Recollections of a Capitol Hill lobbyist for UNICEF," It is a personal account, depicting two and a half decades of dedicated service in behalf of the U.N. Children's Fund, which merits both our recognition and our collective appreciation.

Of all programs within the U.N. system, UNICEF is generally regarded as one of the most effective, and U.S. contributions have always been essential to the organization's survival. Virginia Gray was tireless in campaigning for congressional appropriations to aid mothers and children—and she was highly persuasive in her efforts to clear up misunderstandings which often arose over seemingly unrelated issues which had a potentially negative impact on UNICEF. Her weapon, as always, in this struggle was to make the facts available and to let the facts speak for themselves.

In her book, Mrs. Gray discusses the structure and functions of UNICEF, its place in the U.N. system and the history of its development from its inception in 1946 to the present. Her description of the practical lobbying measures she employed over 25 years of devoted service to her cause remain relevent today.

Several years ago, Mrs. Gray received UNICEF's Oscar "in appreciation for distinguished service to the U.N. Children's Fund and through it, to the mothers of the world." It was an award long overdue to this remarkable woman and promoter of the general interest.

I commend both her accomplishments and her book to the attention of my colleagues.●

REFORM IN FEDERAL SPENDING

HON. BEAU BOULTER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, throughout my congressional campaign, I emphasized the dire need in this country for reform in Federal spending. "Balanced budget," "fiscal responsibility," and "reduced spending" were probably the most frequently used words in my vocabulary.

When I arrived in Washington, I was surprised—shocked actually—to find that other than individual legislative efforts, no real consolidated push was being made to begin implementing the cost-cutting recommendations of the President's private sector survey on cost control—the Grace Commission.

At Budget Committee field hearings I was fortunate enough to meet with J. Peter Grace, head of the commission, and spoke with him about the fact that a full 73 percent of the 2,478 recommendations made by the commission to cut waste and inefficiency throughout the Federal Government, required congressional action for enactment. We discussed the possibility of a caucus designed solely to push for that enactment.

To get an idea of how badly we need to begin implementing Grace Commission recommendations we only need to consider an example Mr. Grace gave me. At our current rate of spending, by the year 2000 our annual deficit will be $2 trillion—that is $169,000 per taxpayer.

This example was inspiration for me to found the Grace caucus in the House of Representatives. In order to make this caucus the most effective in its efforts to cut the fat from the Federal Government, I invited Congressman BUDDY ROEMER from Louisiana to serve as cochair of this bipartisan effort.

At the kickoff meeting for the Grace caucus, Mr. Grace himself spoke to a group representing over 30 Members of Congress about the value of such a caucus and what it might hope to accomplish. He presented to us, at that meeting, a list of the 10 areas in which action could start immediately chopping away at the $424 billion in Federal waste that the Grace Commission has identified.

These areas, ranging from procurement and contracting out within the Department of Defense to Federal personnel management systems, will serve as the basis for the task forces within the caucus. Each will direct its energies toward specific recommendations, and work to coordinate legislative initiatives to enact cost-saving measures.

The response to the Grace caucus, I am pleased to report, has been strong. We are preparing to announce our bipartisan Executive Steering Committee, designed to provide leadership and direction on this vital effort. I have included a list of 54 Members of the House who want to take an active role in this movement to finally stop talking about reducing the Federal waste and needless costs taking firm action.

Mr. Speaker, we hear a lot about our economic problems. We hear that the trade deficit is the most immediate threat to our economic viability. We all know unemployment is a continuing legitimate concern, and the final answer will be long-term economic growth.

With these goals in mind, let me say our economic problems exist due to one overriding ill present in our economy, and that is the lack of capital formation. If our industries could raise the capital they need at lower interest rates and without the fear of returning inflation, then we would not have the lagging economic indicators we have today. My point is that Mr. Speaker: As the economist Milton Friedman says, the problem is not the deficit, it is the size of Federal spending.

Our Nation can never have adequate capital formation so long as its Government spends money without regard to purpose or efficiency. The Grace Commission did us a great service by presenting Congress with specific recommendations as to how this Government spends money contradictorily and inefficiently. If we simply reduce duplicity of effort and the inefficiency in our Federal Government, then we will do a great service in allowing ample capital formation for future economic growth. It is with this purpose, that the Grace caucus proceeds.

I have written a letter, which all the Republican members of the House Budget Committee have cosigned, requesting that the budget resoluton reported out of the committee include definitive language requiring each standing committee of the House to review the recommendations made by the Grace Commission which fall within their jurisdiction, and report on the potential impact of implementation of each spending reduction option. That letter has been sent to the chairman of the Budget Committee, the Honorable WILLIAM GRAY.

While we all realize that not all of the recommendations are viable, adoption of only one-fourth of the recommendations would potentially save $100 billion over the next 3 years. By studying each recommendation, we feel that a consensus can be reached on a significant number to produce substantial savings to the Federal budget.

Since forming the Grace caucus, I have had several opportunities to speak with outside groups representing wide-ranging interests in the private sector. Again, the support for the Grace caucus has been strong.

And just within the past few days, I have spoken to Members of the other body about their interest in forming a bicameral arm of the Grace caucus.

Obviously, the idea is catching on. I honestly believe that there is a growing voice among the American people, urging us to begin action that will serve to substantially reduce our Federal deficit, and bring our financial house into order.

I look forward to the growing role that I am convinced that the Grace caucus will play in our battle of the budget. The recommendations made by the Grace Commission are, in many cases, clear and simple opportunities to hold true to our commitments of fiscal responsibility. I encourage any of my colleagues who are interested in being a part of this action to contact me.

FLAWED RULING BY THE IRS

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing a bill to correct a wrong done to over 100 workers in North Dakota as a result of a flawed ruling by the Internal Revenue Service. I introduced the identical bill in the 98th Congress which passed in the House but not in the Senate and, subsequently, did not survive the committee of conference on the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984. If my bill had been enacted last term, taxpayers who have patiently sought restitution for over 10 years would have achieved the justice denied them by the IRS ruling.

Present law (Code sec. 162) allows a deduction for all ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred in carrying on a trade or business. Traveling expenses—including meals and lodging—which meet these general requirements are deductible if incurred while away from home in the pursuit of a trade or business. No deduction is allowed for personal, living, or family expenses, including the cost of commuting to and from work.

Between 1970 and 1974, the U.S. Government employed a large number of workers at the anti-ballistic-missile [ABM] site near Nekoma, ND. Many of these workers had to travel great distances to get to the job. In addition, there was no housing at the job site. The ABM workers who had to travel great distances to get to the job site availed themselves of the deduction allowed under section 162.

But, the IRS disallowed the deduction for those workers who had worked on the ABM site more than 12 months. Over 118 workers at the ABM site in North Dakota were denied the travel-expense deductions legally owed to them, while workers who had been employed at the site for less than 1 year were allowed the deductions. This happened because the IRS ruled that away-from-home expenses are deductible if the duration of one's assignment, at a location away from home, is temporary, that is, if it is less than 12 months. If the job is for more than 1 year, the IRS classifies it as indefinite and disallows the deductions.

I believe this IRS rule is flawed because it fails to distinguish travel undertaken for employment purposes from travel undertaken for personal purposes. In essence, the workers at the ABM site incurred travel expenses in order to practice their trade but could not take the deductions allowed under section 162.

Under my bill, traveling expenses in connection with employment at the anti-ballistic-missile site near Nekoma, ND are deductible if (1) the expenses are otherwise deductible as a business expense under section 162(a); (2) the expenses were paid or incurred after 1969 and before 1975; and (3) the expenses were claimed on a tax return filed for any taxable year which includes any portion of the period described in (2). Also, the bill permits taxpayers who are entitled as a result of the provisions of the bill to a refund or credit of any overpayment, but for the operation of the statute of limitations or other rule of law, to obtain the refund or credit by filing a claim within 1 year after the date of enactment. The bill applies to taxable years ending after 1969, with respect to expenses paid or incurred after 1969 and before 1975.●

THE PROPER DECISION WAS MADE

HON. J.J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of partisan rhetoric over the issue of who won the election in the Eighth District of Indiana from both parties in recent months. Throughout this debate I have tried to look beyond party politics and to make a decision that is fair and based on the facts. After closely examining all of the information available on this issue, I can find no reason to dispute the finding of the House Administration Committee that Representative FRANK MCCLOSKEY won the election.

I must admit that I had serious reservations from the beginning about whether the House should get involved in this election. I believe we should accept the State-certified election returns, except in extremely unusual cases. However, after the House investigation got underway, we found that the counting irregularities did justify our intervention and the task force recount was conducted in a fair, thorough, and open manner.

I have not participated in the debate on this issue over the past 4 months. Instead, I have tried to observe the entire process as objectively as possible. And in the end, I reached three conclusions.

First, it is entirely proper for the House to review this election. Article 1, section 5 of the Constitution states: "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." In the past 100 years, both Houses have had to decide many disputed elections. It is a difficult role for us to fulfill but it is one that is mandated by our Constitution.

Second, it is clear that the conduct of the election and the recount process in Indiana were both disasters. Election laws and procedures were ignored in some areas and applied selectively in others. Voting and recount procedures varied in nearly each of the counties in the district. Some have criticized the House Administration Committee for not following Indiana law in its counting procedure but it is obvious that Indiana law has not been applied consistently at many points since the moment the polls opened on the morning of November 6, 1984.

Third, the investigation by the House Administration Committee and the recount by the General Accounting Office were the fairest and most accurate possible under the tangled circumstances of that election. I have reviewed the counting rules and procedures used by the GAO and I have been unable to find any fault in them. I have read the transcript of all of the meetings of the task force and cannot find any point at which any effort was made to favor one candidate over another.

On the critical issue of whether to count 32 absentee ballots, I believe the task force made the right decision in not counting them. Even though similar ballots had improperly been mixed in with other ballots and counted on election night and could no longer be distinguished from legitimate ballots, that was no reason to compound the error by counting 32 more improperly cast ballots. Even the recount director, James Shumway, who was recommended by the Republicans and confirmed by the Democrats to supervise the recount, has stated that those ballots should not be counted.

Mr. Speaker, when this dispute arose in the House in January, I made a commitment to my constituents that I would not make a decision based on party politics so I have taken a very critical look at this entire matter. I have searched for any indication that the work of the task force was designed to achieve a desired result. There is no indication that happened. And since I can find no objection to the process, I cannot dispute the final result.

The bitter political fight over this election has obscured many of these facts. But no one stole this election. Moreover, I deeply, deeply resent anyone saying that the election was stolen. Anyone who claims that the election was stolen is simply and purely engaging in political demagoguery.

Mr. Speaker, after examining the facts in this case, I am convinced that the proper decision was to seat Representative FRANK MCCLOSKEY and that no other conclusion can be justified.●

A TRIBUTE TO DR. PEGGY BUCKLEY

HON. WILLIAM M. THOMAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to inform my colleagues today that Dr. Peggy Buckley of Bakersfield College is being honored as 1985 Kern RN of the Year.

It pleases me to learn that Peggy Buckley is receiving this honor, not only because her entire professional career as a registered nurse and educator has been exemplary, but also because Peggy is a long and dear acquaintance whom I greatly respect and admire.

I will not even attempt, in the limited time available here, to list all of Peggy Buckley's many contributions to nursing and to the field of education. She was already a veteran educator at Bakersfield College when I arrived here as a government teacher fresh from graduate school in 1965, and I have witnessed in the years since what it means to be totally committed to one's profession and one's community.

Peggy Buckley has built Bakersfield College's nursing program into one of the finest of its kind in the country. At the same time, she has furthered her own education, receiving B.A., M.A., and Ed.D. degrees while employed fulltime as a registered nurse and educator. She has put these advanced degrees to good use in the nursing program where she inspires respect and devotion among her students and colleagues. Ask anyone who knows Peggy Buckley what sort of person she is, and to a person, they will be effusive in their praise.

One fact, perhaps, helps to portray Peggy's sense of dedication as well as any personal testimony that I could offer: Peggy still works 1 weekend each month as a staff nurse at an acute-care hospital, using time that all would agree she is entitled to spend leisurely, serving others.

In addition to her work as director of Bakersfield College's registered nursing program and her monthly "moonlighting" stint, Peggy Buckley serves her community as a member of numerous county and State nursing, medical, health, and education advisory councils.

I cannot imagine a more qualified recipient of the RN of the Year award than Peggy Buckley. Peggy is a "nurse's nurse," a "teacher's teacher" and someone whom I am proud to know. I commend Dr. Buckley to my colleagues, and I would also like to say, "Congratulations, Peggy. You certainly deserve it."●

CALL FOR MS. HALL'S RESIGNATION

HON. CHARLES A. HAYES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, the pattern of insensitivity of the Reagan administration toward minorities has manifested itself once again. Black Americans and, indeed, all Americans of good conscience, are incensed by the act of the Reagan administration's newly appointed chairman of the Copyright Royalty Tribunal—Ms. Marianne Hall.

As many Members of this body know, Ms. Hall was the professional writer/editor of a book entitled, "Foundations of Sand," which so degrades black Americans that it could very easily have been published by the Ku Klux Klan. I am outraged, but unfortunately not surprised, that an official of this administration has admitted coauthoring a book filled with some of the most despicable racial garbage I have ever heard in my life. Using terms such as "jungle-freedom-types" and advocating policies such as "separate but superior schools with all male teachers," she has brought racism to a new low. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, Ms. Hall's appointment only typifies the attitude of the Reagan administration toward minorities in this country and for that matter, in its foreign policies as well.

The President has a Civil Rights Commission which has basically divested itself from offering any support to our civil rights statutes. He has an Equal Employment Opportunity Commission which lacks the initiative to pursue meaningful reforms of employment discrimination practices. His foreign policy of constructive engagement allows our Government to sit idly by while hundreds of black South Africans are killed simply because they want to enjoy the same freedom as their white counterparts. Now, our President will visit Bitburg, the scene of atrocities that are unthinkable in our Nation today.

Mr. Speaker, while it is the prerogative of the President to appoint people who share his political ideology, the citizens of this country deserve to have appointees who do not bring with them such openly racist attitudes and beliefs such as those demonstrated by Ms. Hall.

I do not want to hear excuses from Ms. Hall that she merely edited the work. I call on President Reagan to immediately request her resignation. Hopefully, before he can do that, Ms. Hall will find it within herself to resign and save what little respect she now carries. Mr. Speaker, we have a lot of problems with this administration, and her leaving will not solve them all. But, it will indicate an end to the latest episode of blatant racism to surface from this administration.●

NEW LEGISLATION TO REFORM BALLOT ACCESS AND BALLOT STATUS LAWS FOR ALL FEDERAL ELECTIONS

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation to reform the enormously difficult ballot access and ballot status requirements for Federal elections now in effect in most States. This measure takes a step toward democratizing the electoral process by equalizing the standards for participation imposed in independent and major and minor party candidates. Its passage will result in a strengthening of the voting rights protected by the 1st, 14th, and 15th amendments to the Constitution.

During the past century, State legislatures have imposed increasingly burdensome restrictions on access to the ballot by independent and minor party candidates. In 1984, a Democratic Party Presidential candidate needed only 25,500 valid petition signatures to run in every primary and caucus in this country. By contrast, it took an independent candidate 5 times that number of signatures to appear on the California ballot alone, and 30 times that number of signatures—725,000—to appear on the ballot in all 50 States and the District of Columbia.

Signature requirements for independent Presidential candidates range from a low of 175 in Washington to a high of 116,000 in California. Some States require that petition signatures be obtained within a very limited period of time. Arizona, for example, requires 7,264 signatures be collected in a 10-day period. Still, States such as New York, Michigan, Missouri, and Virginia impose geographical distribution requirements stipulating where and how many signatures must be collected. On the other hand, other States—for example, Kansas—require that the petition circulator live in the same neighborhood as the petition signer even if the candidate is running for a Federal office.

While virtually all Sates recognize the right of an individual candidate to run for office, many States impose additional restrictions on the use of party designations by independent candidates. Ohio, Oregon, Oklahoma, Alabama, Montana, North Dakota, Kansas, and Nebraska require additional and often unattainable petition signatures for party designation. Illinois requires that a party, to have its name appear on the ballot, run an entire slate of candidates.

In California a minor party must register 81,000 voters into the party in order to appear on the ballot. Laws in Texas, New York, Arizona, Nebraska, and West Virginia make the right of independent candidates' names to appear on the ballot inconsistent with the electorate's right to vote, in that voters who sign nominating petitions for independents are prohibited from voting in a primary election for the same office. The New England States, Michigan, Florida, and Arizona require independent candidates to go through the laborious process of checking local voter registration rolls to verify the registration of each signer. Michigan has no procedures for independent candidates to get on the ballot, even though the State has lost ballot access cases in Federal court since 1976. In Georgia, a political party needs 60,000 people to sign 11 petitions each if it is to have a party designation on the ballot. Such diversity in requirements creates an unduly burdensome and restrictive environment into which citizens seeking to exercise their voting rights must venture in order to compete with major party candidates.

The right to ballot status, automatic access for a party's candidates to the ballot, is also more difficult to achieve for minor parties than major parties. For example, Georgia requires 20 percent of the vote for Governor or 20 percent of the entire national vote for President. Alabama requires 20 percent of the vote in any statewide election. Because different States require that the threshold number of votes be obtained in different electoral contests, that is Congress in Wyoming, Secretary of State in Indiana, it is impossible for a new party to obtain ballot status in more than 32 States even if that party's candidate won the Presidency of the United States.

These onerous, and in many instances, prohibitive restrictions on ballot access are justified on the grounds that the electorate needs to be protected against frivolous candidates. On the contrary, the labyrinth of State-enacted restrictions on participation in the electoral process by independent candidates and parties deprives them, together with the great number of voters who would otherwise vote for these candidates and parties, of their constitutional rights of freedom of political expression and equal protection under the law.

There is a clear need for Federal legislation in the area of State electoral laws in order to eliminate this unfairness. That is why I have proposed legislation which creates fair and uniform standards for ballot access and ballot status in all Federal elections. The test of this measure is as follows:

H.R. 2320

A bill to enforce the guarantees of the first, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States by prohibiting certain devices used to deny the right to participate in certain elections

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. BALLOT ACCESS RIGHTS.

A State shall not use any device to abridge or deny the right of an individual to be placed as a candidate on, or to have such individual's political party, body, or group affiliation in connection with such candidacy placed on, a ballot or similar voting materials to be used in a Federal election.

SEC. 2. DEFINITION OF DEVICE.

For the purposes of this Act, the term "device" means any requirement, condition, or prerequisite to being placed on, or having individual's political party, body, or group affiliation placed on, a ballot or similar voting materials, other than a requirement, condition, or prerequisite described in section 3.

SEC. 3. ALLOWED REQUIREMENTS FOR BALLOT ACCESS.

(a) PETITION.—A State may impose any or all of the following requirements, conditions, or prerequisites:

(1) That an individual seeking to exercise rights protected by this Act present a petition stating in substance that the signatories desire such individual's name and political party, body, or group affiliation to be placed on the ballot or other similar voting materials to be used in the Federal election with respect to which such rights are to be exercised.

(2) That the political party, body, or group affiliation, if any, of such individual be shown on such petition.

(3) That such petition, to be effective, must have not more than the greater of—

(A) 1000 signatures; or

(B) a number of signatures equal to 1 tenth of 1 percent of the number of registered voters on the date of the most recent previous Federal election, if any, for the office for which such individual is a candidate who voted in such election for such office.

(4) That such petition may be signed only by persons residing anywhere in the bounds of the geographic area from which an individual is to be elected to such office.

(5) That such petition may be circulated only during a period—

(A) beginning not later than the 270th day before the date of the election with respect to which such rights are to be exercised; and

(B) ending not earlier than the 60th day before the date of such election.

(b) PARTY VOTE.—A State may impose the requirement, condition, or prerequisite that, in order to have an individual's political party, body, or group affiliation placed on a ballot or similar voting materials to be used in the Federal election with respect to which rights protected by this Act are to be exercised, without having to satisfy any requirement relating to a petition under section 3(a), that or another individual, as a candidate of that political party, body, or group, must have received whichever is the lesser of—

(1) 20,000 votes; or

(2) 1 percent of the votes cast;

in the most recent general Federal election for President or Senator in that State.

SEC. 4. RULEMAKING.

The Attorney General may make rules to carry out this Act.

SEC. 5. GENERAL DEFINITIONS.

As used in this Act—

(1) the term "Federal election" means a primary, general, special, or runoff election for the office of—

(A) President or Vice President;

(B) Senator; or

(C) Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress; and

(2) the term "State" means a State of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and any other territory or possession of the United States.●

CLIFFORD/McNAMARA WARN ABOUT ADVERSE ARMS CONTROL AND BUDGET IMPACT OF SDI

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, in testimony yesterday before my Subcommittee on Arms Control, former Defense Secretaries Clark Clifford and Robert S. McNamara highlighted the adverse arms control and budgetary impact of the President's proposed Strategic Defense Initiatives [SDI]. Yesterday's hearing was the second in a series of hearings in the 99th Congress on arms control in space. These hearings represent a continuation of the hearings conducted by the subcommittee during the 98th Congress which led to the release of the subcommittee's Interim Report on the Administration's Space Arms Control and Defense Policy on May 17, 1984. That Interim Report identified the following five areas of concern which still remain true today. They are: Excessive costs of SDI, the technical nonfeasibility of a perfect nuclear defense, the incompatibility of SDI and arms control, the growing likelihood of United States and Soviet Union defense programs stimulating a dual nuclear arms race in both offensive and defensive nuclear weapons, and the alienation of our closest allies in Europe.

Commenting on the impact of a U.S. decision to develop and deploy even partial defense systems, Clifford said: "This will effectively and perhaps permanently prevent control and reduction of Soviet offensive missile systems." He added: "It will drive both sides to seek security in unilateral action rather than negotiation."

In his testimony, former Secretary of Defense McNamara underscored the necessity for both the United States and the Soviets to reaffirm their commitment to the ABM Treaty "because the treaty formalizes the insight that not only the deployment, but even the development of strategic defenses would stimulate an offensive buildup. Were the treaty to collapse, we could not move toward our goal of reducing the offensive threat."

Both former Secretaries of Defense also endorsed the necessity to maintain a prudent research program in defense systems with Secretary Clifford recommending keeping the fiscal year 1986 level at the current fiscal year 1985 level of $1.4 billion.

As we all examine the administration's fiscal year 1986 SDI/BMD request of $4.2 billion, it is my hope that we will work toward substantially reducing that figure to a level more consistent with our fiscal and arms control interests.●

STANISLAUS STATE UNIVERSITY

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to take this opportunity to recognize California State University, Stanislaus [CSUS] on its newly conferred university status. Stanislaus State University was authorized by Gov. Goodwin J. Knight in 1957 as a State college. In 1963, its first accreditation was given, and freshmen began entering in 1965 as the first two master's degrees were awarded. Since that time, numerous achievements in sports have been attained by students such as the college's first all-American athlete in 1971, CSCS's first division III championships in golf and baseball, and in 1981, the basketball team earned fourth place in the Nation.

The academic achievements of the CSCS have been noteworthy. The academic area was organized into a three-school model of arts, letters, and sciences; business administration; and education. By 1984, over 10,000 students had graduated from CSCS. In 1979, the library collection surpassed over 200,000 volumes. In 1980, interactive microwave television was beamed to two surrounding cities creating more opportunity for students to take advantage of the academic opportunities at CSCS. In March of 1985, the board of trustees of the California State University approved university status for the college.

In light of California State University, Stanislaus' achievement of university status, I would like to invite you to join with me in congratulating CSUS on its new status. CSUS has earned the respect of the academic world, and deserved ours as well.●

REAL ESTATE TRANSFER TAX

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I will on Monday, May 6, introduce legislation which would eliminate any tax on the gain from the sale of real estate and would substitute in its stead a flat 2 percent Federal transfer tax. The legislation I am proposing today is revenue neutral and is designed to provide greater economic freedom and increase the transferability of real estate.

Gains from the sale of real estate are usually taxed at capital gains rates which can be as high as 20 percent. At the same time, the Code provides numerous mechanisms for avoiding this capital gains tax, like-kind exchanges, roll overs, and income exclusions are all methods by which the capital gains tax can be avoided. These opportunities have resulted in numerous uneconomic decisions to avoid paying the capital gains tax. A simple 2 percent transfer tax would free people from this unnecessary and uneconomic tax planning while, at the same time, assuring that we collect some tax revenue from real estate. The low level of the transfer tax attests to the general failure of the capital gains tax on noninventory real estate. A real estate transfer tax would be largely self-enforcing since nonpayment of the tax would give the government a lien on the property and therefore cloud the property's title. A transfer tax would also free individuals from the need to constantly roll over their principal residence and from having to wait until age 55 to take advantage of the once-in-a-lifetime exclusion. Legislation would apply to all nonbusiness inventory property, both residential and commercial and would be effective for tranfers after the date of enactment of the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I think my legislation will be supported by those who sincerely believe that our tax system should work as simply and unintrusively as possible. It will, of course, be opposed by those who habitually and consistently avoid any tax on real estate gains. In the spirit of tax reform is it not better to have a maximum 2-percent tax on real estate rather than a 20-percent tax on real estate gains?

The text of the legislation follows:

H.R. 2366

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to exempt all gain from the sale of real property from income tax and to impose a transfer tax on transfers of real property

TAX REFORM AND PUERTO RICO

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit for the RECORD an article from yesterday's Washington Post. It speaks of the Treasury Department's proposal to eliminate section 936 of the Internal Revenue Code.

As we all know, section 936 allows companies establishing in Puerto Rico substantial tax credit for doing so.

These companies in turn create jobs and add a much needed stimulus to the island's economy. Once their incentive, in the form of tax credits is gone, many of these companies may seek to relocate. The result of this is obvious; increased unemployment, increased government spending. The impetus that section 936 provides to private sector investment initiative, once removed, will be difficult and expensive to replace.

The benefits of this program are obvious, as is the necessity to keep it in place.

[From the Washington Post, May 1, 1985]

PUERTO RICO SUPPORTS TAX CREDIT

(By Anne Swardson)

For more than three decades, the tax credit granted to U.S. companies operating in Puerto Rico has induced firms to locate on the island territory and has created jobs in a depressed region, proponents say. Both Puerto Rico and the companies have benefited, by their account.

Now they want to make sure that the Treasury Department—which calls the credit expensive, inefficient, and complicated—doesn't take all that away.

One of the many provisions of the department's tax-simplification plan now up for White House review would repeal the possessions tax credit, the mechanism by which American firms legally can avoid paying almost all taxes on income from Puerto Rican operations.

The possibility of repeal has the governor of Puerto Rico pleading his case in Washington this week for at least the second time this year, saying his entire economy hangs on the provision. Numerous companies with operations in Puerto Rico, as well as such notable business people as David Rockefeller, are lobbying the administration and members of Congress.

"Section 936 is absolutely essential to the economic well-being of Puerto Rico," Gov. Rafael Hernandez Colon told reporters yesterday. "More than 200,000 jobs depend on it."

Hernandez Colon is to make his arguments before Vice President George Bush today, after meeting yesterday with Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.), cosponsor of a simplification bill that also would trash the tax credit, and making a pitch to administration officials.

The third major tax-revision measure, sponsored by Rep. Jack Kemp (R-N.Y.) and Sen. Robert W. Kasten Jr. (R-Wis.), would preserve the credit on the grounds that private-sector stimulus is the best way to aid the economically ailing island. The unemployment rate in Puerto Rico is 22 percent, and supporters of Section 936 say it would rise to 30 percent if the credit were repealed.

In a paper submitted to Treasury Secretary James A. Baker III when he met with Hernandez Colon last month, the government predicts such dire consequences as withdrawal of the 41 percent of Puerto Rican commercial bank deposits that belong to U.S. corporations, migration of more residents to the United States and increased federal welfare payments in Puerto Rico.

Many U.S. companies would pack up and leave, relocating principally to cheap-labor regions such as the Pacific Basin, according to representatives of the firms themselves.

David J. Aho, Washington representative of American Hospital Supply Corp., said that, if the credit were repealed, his firm probably would phase out operations that now employ 3,100 Puerto Ricans. "The move would be elsewhere," he said.

The Treasury Department disagrees that the economic effect of repealing Section 936 would be widespread. The first plan proposes easing the transition with a tax credit equal to part of the wages paid. That might send high-technology and capital-intensive firms off the island, but it would attract labor-intensive industries that provide more jobs, officials believe.

Treasury officials ask how the tax break can be such a stimulus to employment if the unemployment rate is still so high. And they ask the point of forgoing corporate income taxes equal to $22,000 per worker for employes who are earning only $14,210.

"The current system is complex, expensive and ineffective," says the written explanation of the original Treasury plan. "The rules for determining possessions source income are among the most complex in the tax law. The average revenue cost per job was more than 150 percent of the average total compensation of employes of Section 936 corporations. Despite this, total employment has been flat."

At a lunch yesterday, Hernandez Colon and Rockefeller told representatives of the United States Information Agency, Commerce Department, Defense Department, State Department and White House that those conclusions were wrong. Doing away with Section 936 would hurt not only Puerto Rico but also run counter to the intent of President Reagan's Caribbean Basin Initiative, which relies on tax incentives and the private sector, Hernandez Colon said.

He added that repeal of the credit would end a project under which four U.S. companies are committed to producing nurses' hats in a joint operation in Puerto Rico and Grenada.●

CINCO DE MAYO CELEBRATION

HON. ESTEBAN EDWARD TORRES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important days in Mexican history is known as Cinco de Mayo.

The fifth of May, or Cinco de Mayo, commemorates the 1862 Battle of Puebla. During that battle Mexican forces defeated an overwhelming French force of Emperor Napoleon III.

Mexicans and people of Mexican-American heritage celebrate Cinco de Mayo, not because of its military significance, but rather, because it is a triumph of human spirit and courage in the face of almost certain disaster.

Along with the celebrations that commemorate this day, it is important to reflect on the contributions Hispanics have made to this country.

American life has been enhanced by the culture of Mexico. The language, art, music, and food have added richness to this Nation.

Long before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock, Mexicans were in this country.

Indeed, many areas in the Southwest United States can point to over 200 hundred years of Hispanic culture and history.

The greatest resource that Mexico has given the United States are the people who have stayed to become citizens of this country and raise their families here.

Mexican-Americans are proud of the prominent role we have played in the history of the United States.

We have displayed our patriotism in every war the United States has fought. The many heroic acts of bravery by Hispanic men are a matter of record.

As an ethnic group Hispanics are the largest recipients of Congressional Medals of Honor.

Beginning with the War of 1812, Spanish-American War, Mexican, World Wars I and II and of course the Korean and Vietnam wars Hispanic and Mexican-American men have been honored with 35.

Olympic athletes, Congressional Medal of Honor recipients and Nobel laureates, are but a few examples of how Hispanics have contributed to American society.

As the Mexican army had to overcome tremendous odds to beat the French at the Battle of Puebla, Hispanics of the Southwest have had to struggle to overcome barriers in education, housing, and employment.

The story is not complete as young Hispanic men and women, who exemplify, the spirit of Cinco de Mayo move ahead as leaders in business, science and government.

We have much to celebrate on Cinco de Mayo, and along with the victory at the Battle of Puebla we salute the proud spirit of the Mexican people.●

JUDGE SCHATZ EARNED RESPECT

HON. HAL DAUB

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, this past Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Albert Schatz, a Federal jurist for nearly 12 years, passed away. His death is a great loss not only to the Omaha community that loved and respected him but also to the judiciary and the legal profession to which he dedicated himself.

A graduate of the University of Nebraska and the Creighton University School of Law, Judge Schatz served in the Marines during World War II and attained the rank of captain. He practiced law in Nebraska for 23 years before his appointment to the U.S. district court bench.

The judge's record of public service is an exemplary one, and his remarkable career stands as a lasting tribute to this respected gentleman. Among the many difficult cases he handled, his most outstanding achievement was his thoughtful and effective implementation of the Omaha School District implementation plan.

Judge Schatz will be sorely missed by his devoted family and the community he served, but he will be long remembered with the fondness and dignity that his distinguished service merits.

At this point I would like to share with my colleagues an editorial in memorial to the judge that appeared in today's Omaha World Herald:

JUDGE SCHATZ EARNED RESPECT

Albert G. Schatz was what a U.S. district judge ought to be. He was firm, logical, objective and thoroughly professional. He was respected by other judges and is remembered for his abilities, his friendliness and his sense of humor.

Judge Schatz, who died Tuesday of cancer, had a career consising of 29 years of law practice and 12 years as a federal judge. He handled some of the toughest cases to come before the court during the past dozen years.

One was the Beatrice State Home case, in which Schatz supervised a settlement that led to a balance between institutional care and community-based care for mentally retarded Nebraskans.

Schatz particularly deserves to be remembered for his sensible handling of the case involving the racial integration of the Omaha Public Schools.

He ruled that the school district wasn't guilty of intentional racial discrimination. But after his decision was overturned by the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, it became his responsibility to supervise the preparation and implementation of an integration plan beginning in 1976.

Schatz did so with wisdom and flexibility. The plan included busing, and Schatz also let the school district use such things as high school recruiting programs and magnet schools to encourage voluntary integration when that appeared to be a practical way of achieving racial balance in some schools.

By 1983, the goals of the plan had been met, and without the violence that occurred in some other cities in a simialr situation. A number of people share the credit for that Schatz was one.

Fellow judges elected Schatz to the U.S. Judicial Council. U.S. Circuit Court Judge Donald Ross said Schatz was regarded as "one of our best judges." Chief District Judge Donald Lay said Schatz was well respected by federal judges around the country.

Judge Schatz earned such respect. His death at age 63—an age at which many judges can look forward to additional years of public service—is a loss to the judiciary and the community as well as to his family and friends.●

HANDI-CAPABLE, NOT HANDICAPPED

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend to the attention of my colleagues an anonymous poem which appeared in a recent issue of the Louisville Times.

The poem was forwarded to me by my good friend and pen pal, Louisvillian Jim Burrice. Jim has cerebral palsy but that has not kept him from earning a degree at Bellarmine and from taking the lead in our hometown on civic programs to benefit the handicapped.

Jim is a talented writer and essayist in his own right, and he felt the poem underscores, in a powerful and personal way, the problems faced by handicapped people in adapting to society's mainstream—and of being accepted for the loving, giving, caring, and capable human beings they are.

I had an opportunity to see and hear more about these problems firsthand recently when I visited a jobs fair held in Louisville sponsored by the Action League for Physically Handicapped Adults [ALPHA]. The theme of the fair was clear and to the point: "Hire the Handi-capable."

In effect, people whom we might all too quickly catalog as handicapped are in their own eyes—and gratefully, more and more in everyone's eyes—Handi-capable.

That, Mr. Speaker, certainly describes Jim Burrice. He has been a model and an inspiration to me and to many of his townspeople.

In this connection, I was pleased when two recent controversial appointees to high posts in the U.S. Department of Education were forced to resign—following publication of their narrow and rather medieval views on the handicapped. Attitudes such as these represent an abysmal lack of sensitivity to the issue of the innate and the market worth of persons with physical or mental limitations. But more to the point, they represent a remarkable lack of commonsense understanding of the talents and abilities of these self-same persons.

Following, is the poem Jim Burrice sent me which all of us will benefit from reading—and mulling over.

FOR FRIENDS OF THE HANDICAPPED

Blessed are you who take the time
To listen to difficult speech,
For you help me to know that
If I persevere,
I can be understood.

Blessed are you who never bid me to "hurry up"
Or take my tasks from me
And do them for me,
For I often need time rather than help.

Blessed are you who stand beside me
As I enter new and untried ventures,
For my failures will be outweighted
By the times I surprise myself and you.

Blessed are you who asked for my help,
For my greatest need is to be needed.

Blessed are you who understand that
It is difficult for me
To put my thoughts into words.

Blessed are you who with a smile,
Encourage me to try once more.

Blessed are you who never remind me
That today I asked the same question twice.

Blessed are you who respect me
And love me just as I am.●

ALTERNATIVE METHOD OF DRAWBACK INTRODUCED

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H.R. 2334, which provides exporters the opportunity to use an alternative method of obtaining customs duty drawback.

Currently exporters can receive duty drawback on imported components used in the manufacturing process then exported, or they can receive it on items imported but exported in the same condition. Those who file a claim for drawback must list document each imported part of an item with the amount of duty paid on each item. 99 percent of the total duty paid can be recovered as drawback.

Some exporters, including many small companies, manufacture products which contain hundreds of parts. Dozens of these parts may be imported from various parts of the world. Different models of the same piece of equipment can contain an entirely different mix of domestic and imported parts. Filling out a drawback claim for each model each time a drawback claim is made can be so burdensome as to cost more in manpower alone than could possibly be obtained in drawback. For that reason, many companies have elected not to file drawback claims. Especially, many small companies just do not have the resources to devote to that kind of paperwork, for no or little benefit. Many companies are losing a valuable export incentive by failing to file claims. Drawback was meant to rebate duties paid on imported items which do not remain in U.S. domestic commerce. It encourages companies to manufacture in this country when it may be more profitable to move offshore. It could give them the competitive edge they need to compete in the international marketplace.

The bill I have introduced gives companies an alternative method of claiming drawback. This system will probably not give them a larger drawback claim than they would receive under the current system. In fact, it will probably be smaller. It will save them manpower hours as compensation, however. It will also be an easier system for Customs to enforce, including much shorter audit times than under the current system. The alternative method is used in Canada under its current drawback system very successfully.

My bill sets up a simple formula for determining duty drawback. You would determine the percentage of your total export sales of a class of merchandise to the total sales of your business or subdivision. You would then multiply that percentage by the total duty paid—less the 1 percent service fee for all drawback payments—within the same accounting period. If exports were 10 percent of your total sales, and duty paid was $1,000, you would receive a drawback check of $100. That figure would be the amount of drawback you would obtain for that period.

Care has been taken in this bill to avoid duplication of drawback claims. It is also assumed that Customs will regularly audit these claims for possible violations. The business data used is that followed in the normal course of business and easily obtainable and documented. The duty payment information would be equally easy to verify, since documentation would have been retained to determine total payment of duty.

This legislation, then, would benefit not only those exporters who use many parts in their manufacturing process and who currently do not file, but it would also provide a cost saving for Customs, both in its drawback liquidation process and its audit process. It will update our drawback law by adding an alternative that reflects the more complicated nature of manufacturing processes we have now.●

THE HOUR IS LATE AND THE EVIDENCE IS CLEAR

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to explain why I voted to support the President's original request for $14 million in military aid to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua, as well as the subsequent Michel amendment to provide them with direct humanitarian aid.

The struggle in Nicaragua is not simply an internal conflict between two factions. It is an attempt by the ruling junta—armed, advised, and financed by the Soviet Union—to impose Communist totalitarianism on Nicaraguans who desire democracy and personal freedom. The United States and the OAS supported the Nicaraguan people in 1979 in their opposition to the repressive Somoza regime, and we must continue to stand by them in their struggle to be truly free.

The Sandinistas are overtly Marxist in both their rhetoric and their affiliations. To date, they have received over $500 million in war materiel, far beyond the amount needed to defend themselves from poorly armed neighbors. Soviet-bloc ship deliveries of military equipment have risen steadily over the past 3 years, from 6 in 1982, to 25 in 1983, to 37 in 1984.

In 1979, Cuban advisers began arriving in Nicaragua on the very day of the revolution, while U.S. offers of qualified Peace Corps volunteers were rejected. There are currently 7,500 to 8,500 Cubans in Nicaragua, including an estimated 1,500 military advisers. There are also 30 to 40 Soviet, and over 60 East German military advisers. The Soviets are helping to complete a 10,000-foot runway at Punta Huete airfield, which will be the longest military runway in Central America. It will be able to accommodate any military aircraft in the Soviet-bloc arsenal.

These and other facts discredit the argument that U.S. policy has pushed the Sandinistas into the Soviet camp. On the contrary, the United States initially supported the Sandinista government, granting it diplomatic recognition only 7 days after the takeover. In the first 2 years of Sandinista rule, U.S. aid actually increased. The United States hasn't pushed reluctant Sandinistas into waiting Soviet arms, they leapt eagerly of their own accord.

I am indignant that there is not a greater moral outrage in this Nation over the treatment of Nicaraguans by the Sandinista regime. Today in Nicaragua, there is no freedom of the press, and no freedom of religion or assembly. The rationing of basic goods is done by political cadres, and is used to achieve political objectives. Around 1,400 political prisoners languish in Sandinista prisons which are off limits to outside observers. More than 20,000 Miskito Indians have fled the country to avoid forced relocation and persecution. The former Jewish community of Nicaragua is now in exile; the synagogue was firebombed during a service. As Adolfo Calero—former Somoza opponent and now a resistance leader—stated: "The very conditions that justified hemispheric intervention against the Somoza regime exist again, but in greater measure."

The ranks of the freedom fighters continue to grow, even without U.S. aid. They now number 15,000—an impressive number when you realize that the armed opposition to Somoza never exceeded 5,000. As Arturo Cruz—former Sandinista junta member and now a democratic opposition leader—noted last March:

> The sheer fact that the ranks of the so-called contras now include 12,000 to 15,000 men is a telling sign that something is genuinely wrong in Nicaragua.

Communist regimes are by their very nature totalitarian. Repression, not popular mandate, is the means by which Communists maintain power. Repression will not end in Nicaragua if the fighting ceases, it will only be easier to enforce.

In a 1961 speech on Cuba, President Kennedy astutely remarked on the nature of Communist takeovers and regimes when he said:

> The legitimate discontent of yearning people is exploited. The legitimate trappings of self-determination are employed. But once in power, all talk of discontent is repressed, all self-determination disappears, and the promise of a revolution of hope is betrayed, as in Cuba, into a reign of terror.

Kennedy understood the threat of communism to Central America, and he had the resolve to confront it. In this same speech, he stated:

> The evidence is clear—and the hour is late. We and our Latin friends will have to face the fact that we cannot postpone any longer the real issue of survival of freedom in this hemisphere itself. On that issue, unlike perhaps some others, there can be no middle ground. Together we must build a hemisphere where freedom can flourish. * * *

Mr. Speaker, I have not given my unconditional support to all U.S. activities in Central America. I voted to condemn the mining of the Nicaraguan harbors, and disagree with certain other CIA activities. In this instance, however, I voted to support the President on aid to the freedom fighters because I know that to abandon the Nicaraguans is to sentence them to live under—as John Kennedy put it—"a reign of terror."●

A BILL TO AMEND THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954

HON. SID MORRISON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which clarifies the circumstances under which construction workers may deduct necessary travel expenses from taxable income. I am happy that the entire Washington State congressional delegation has joined me as cosponsors of this bill.

The bill I am introducing today would allow construction workers living more than 30 miles from their job sites to deduct travel expenses for the first 2 years the worker is employed at that job. Additionally, construction workers can get travel deductions if the job site is a temporary or a remote job site.

I view this bill as an equitable resolution of the current IRS interpretation of the law, which is both inconsistent and arbitrary. Many construction workers all across the country work on a temporary basis at various construction sites and projects. Many of these construction workers are forced to travel scores of miles a day round trip to reach their construction jobs because the sites are remotely located away from reasonable residential accommodations.

In my congressional district, for instance, many construction workers have jobs on the Hanford nuclear reservation, a 570-square-mile complex which is remotely located for national security reasons. Many of the construction workers at that site have little choice but to live more than 30 miles from their jobs. In these situations, I believe an exception should exist in the Tax Code to insure that construction workers have the opportunity to deduct legitimate travel expenses.

Accordingly, the bill I am introducing would make a permanent exception to the overnight standard in the Tax Code which would allow travel deductions for construction workers in those instances when the job site is remotely located and not near residential or reasonable support facilities.

A copy of the bill follows:

H.R. 2346

A BILL To amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to clarify the treatment of travel expenses in the case of construction workers

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 162 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to trade or business expenses) is amended by redesignating subsection (k) as subsection (l) and by inserting after subsection (j) the following new subsection:

"(k) TREATMENT OF TRAVEL EXPENSES IN THE CASE OF CONSTRUCTION WORKERS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of subsection (a), travel expenses of a construction worker shall be treated as expenses incurred while away from home in pursuit of a trade or business (whether or not the taxpayer is away from his residence overnight) if—

"(A) the job site is at least 30 miles from the residence of the construction worker, and

"(B) the job site is a temporary job site or a remote job site.

"(2) TRAVEL EXPENSES.—For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'travel expenses' means the costs incurred by the taxpayer for transportation of the taxpayer between his residence and the job site.

"(B) RESIDENCE.—The term 'residence' means the principal residence of the taxpayer (within the meaning of section 1034 without regard to any ownership requirement).

"(3) TEMPORARY.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this subsection, a job site is temporary if the taxpayer's employment at such site is not indefinite or in any event is for a period of less than 2 years.

"(B) PRIOR DETERMINATIONS NOT TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT.—The determination of whether a job site is temporary shall be made as of the time the travel expenses are incurred without regard to any prior determination under this subsection.

"(4) REMOTE.—For purposes of this subsection, a job site is remote if such site is at least 30 miles from the nearest location offering residential living accommodations and support facilities sufficient to provide for the workers at the job site and their families taking into consideration workers from other job sites and their families who would ordinarily live at such location.

"(5) JOB SITE.—For purposes of this subsection, the term 'job site' means the physical location of the construction, plant, or other work site at which the actual employment activity occurs (determined without regard to the identity of the employer, the ownership of such location, or the existence of other sites in the area).

"(6) CONSTRUCTION WORKER.—For purposes of this subsection, the term 'construction worker' means any individual employed (whether as a skilled, semiskilled, or unskilled laborer) in the building or construction industry; except that such term shall not include clerical or management employees."

(b)(1) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply—

(A) to taxable years ending after January 6, 1983, and

(B) to taxable years ending on or before January 6, 1983, which were open as of such date.

(2) If, on the date of the enactment of this Act or at any time before the date 1 year after such date of enactment, credit or refund of any overpayment of tax attributable to the amendment made by subsection (a) is barred by any law or rule of law, credit or refund of such overpayment may, nevertheless, be allowed or made if claim therefor is filed with the Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate before the day 1 year after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(3) For purposes of paragraph (1)(B), a taxable year is open if (without regard to paragraph (2)) the making of a refund, or the assessment of a deficiency, with respect to such taxable year was not barred as of January 6, 1983, by any law or rule of law.●

VETERANS HEALTH CARE BUDGET CANNOT BE REDUCED FURTHER

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, within the next few weeks, the House and Senate will be making major decisions on the budget for fiscal year 1986. Many Federal programs will be affected. The decisions we must make will not be easy. We all have different priorities.

A very high priority of mine is veterans health care. I want my colleagues to fully understand the impact of any budget reductions in funds to operate the VA's health care system. Who is better able to relate the problems in the field than the people in the field? According to the chiefs of staff at VA hospitals nationwide who responded to a recent survey, inadequate budgets are already taking their toll. More cuts in the budget will mean longer waiting lists, the turning away of certain non-service-connected veterans, and delays in many surgical procedures.

There follows a report from the Chief of Staff at the VA Medical Center in San Antonio, TX:

AUDIE L. MURPHY
MEMORIAL VETERANS' HOSPITAL,
San Antonio, TX, February 7, 1985.

HOWARD H. GREEN, M.D.,
Chief of Staff, VA Medical Center, White River Junction, VT.

DEAR DR. GREEN: The following information is provided in response to your letter of January 2, 1985.

a. Size of hospital (FY 1985 budgeted workload): 674 operating beds; 19,000 patients treated; 560 average daily census; and 174,549 outpatient visits (includes 3 satellite clinics).

b. Affiliated with University of Texas Health Science Center, San Antonio.

c. Projected dollar deficit as of January 1, 1985: Personal Services, $1,015,000; and All Other, $900,000.

d. Impact of dollar deficit:

(1) Personnel.—Our presently approved organizational plan includes positions for 103 physicians. It has been necessary to implement a recruitment lag resulting in a reduction in on-board physicians strength of 98. Similar recruitment lags imposed on certain categories of both clinical and administrative support personnel have not jeopardized the quality of service but do impact response times and can result in longer waits for diagnostic and treatment services.

The mandated reduction in numbers of GS 11/15 positions, if pursued, will have a major effect on our ability to recruit and retain mid-level professionals in pharmacy, clinical laboratory, clinical dietetics, social work and psychology. Situated, as we are, in a medical center consisting of more than 20 competing public, private, and for-profit hospitals and other health care institutions, we are and will increasingly be at a distinct disadvantage in maintaining adequate numbers of experienced supervisory personnel in these fields.

Persistent rumors of an across-the-board pay reduction applied to all Federal employees further compounds the problems and erodes morale and confidence in VA careers.

(2) Supplies.—The costs of drugs, pharmaceuticals and special medical supply items represent a serious funding problem. As a highly specialized tertiary care referral center serving a large and growing number of veterans, this hospital's efficiency and effectiveness has been demonstrated by the DRG case mix methodology. The cost of the drugs, pharmaceuticals and special medical supply items used in supporting this level of activity and complexity has necessitated careful control over the past several years. Certain escalation in these costs will outstrip the potential for further economies without compromising quality, or reducing the level of activity in such programs as medical oncology and cardiac surgery. In spite of its impact on our teaching and research programs, the latter will represent the only acceptable option.

(3) Equipment.—The system-wide limitation on funds for replacing and upgrading medical equipment is particularly deeply felt in this hospital now in its eleventh year. Demands for replacement parts and expendable components of instruments and machines which are being pushed to their maximum capacity have practically eliminated our ability to replace, add, and upgrade equipment to the current state-of-the-art.

(4) Surgical Backlog.—As of the first of this month (February 1985) there is a backlog of approximately 60, ranging from major thoracic cases (5) and total joint replacements (10) to operative cystoscopy (20). This results from a combination of restraints imposed on the Surgical Service, the principal ones being the availability of senior staff and, particularly in the case of orthopaedics, house staff support of the highly specialized operating teams.

e. Solutions.—Over and above our efforts to regularly and diligently monitor both budgeting and outlays, accompanied by an active program of quality control, the only remaining option is a more stringent "door keeping" on admission to care of nonservice-connected candidates.

f. Other—Unlike many other tertiary "flagship" hospitals, this institution is responsible, via its three satellite clinics, for primary health care in a PSA that includes 41 rural counties the total veteran population of which is projected to continue to increase through 1990, with a doubling in the number over 65 years of age. One of these clinics is 250 miles distant in McAllen, Texas, and another 150 miles, in Corpus Christi. The economy in most of the area is depressed, with current unemployment rates ranging as high as 21 percent. The area is short on publicly funded alternatives for health care, and therefore patients, once admitted for VA care, tend to depend almost entirely on the VA clinics for continuous ambulatory services; and when hospitalization is required, must travel to this hospital. The basic costs of maintaining these modestly staffed satellites are perhaps not greater than similar ones in other settings. The added costs of travel, particularly of seriously ill patients who require ambulance or helicopter transportation, and of fee-for-service emergency care in local hospitals and by local consultants, are considerably greater and becoming an almost untolerable burden on ambulatory care fee-basis and travel allocations, which do not recognize this difference.

In addition to the direct dollar drain represented by this situation, the concerns for providing highly specialized tertiary "flagship" services and those of assuring quality primary ambulatory services are difficult to coalesce in a single professional staff. This sunbelt phenomenon, particularly in less affluent areas, will not be significantly changed by the eligibility "reforms" presently being considered by the Administration and therefore we believe must be considered in future resource distribution methodologies.

Chief of Staff.●

FEDERAL MEAT INSPECTION ACT

HON. BERKLEY BEDELL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to amend the Federal Meat Inspection Act. This bill would prohibit the importation of live animals and meat from countries that have standards for antibiotic use in food producing animals which are less stringent than the standards for antibiotic use in the United States. It would also require the Secretary of Agriculture to seek negotiations for an international agreement regarding the standardized use of antibiotics and other drugs in livestock production.

Understandably concerns have recently arisen among both consumers and pork producers over the differences between the regulations governing the use of the antibiotics cloramphenicol and dimethridazole in Canada and the United States. These differences not only pose a potential health hazard to American consumers, but also have resulted in a highly unfair competitive disadvantage for American producers.

The Department of Agriculture has taken the position that if our trading partners control the use of a drug and if drug residues are not found in imported products, then these nations are in compliance with U.S. regulations. However, because the testing procedures currently used by the Department of Agriculture are not wholly effective in determining compliance with U.S. standards, my legislation attempts to encourage the standardization of regulations regarding the use of antibiotics and other drugs in lifestock production.

The text of my bill follows:

H.R. 2379

A Bill To amend the Federal Meat Inspection Act to prohibit the importation of live animals and meat products from countries having standards for the use of certain antibiotics in food-producing animals that are not as stringent as those of the United States, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 20 of the Federal Meat Inspection Act (21 U.S.C. 620) is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(g) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no live animal or meat or meat product may be entered, or withdrawn from warehouses for consumption, in the customs territory of the United States unless the use of the antibiotics cloramphenicol and dimethridazole in food producing animals in the country of origin of that animal or product is subject to prohibitions and limitations that are at least as stringent as those that are applicable at the time, under United States law, to the use of those antibiotics in food producing animals.".

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Agriculture, in consulation with other appropriate departments and officials, shall actively seek and participate in negotiations for the purpose of developing an international agreement regarding the use of antibiotics and other drugs in livestock production.●

TO AMEND TITLE VII OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have recently reintroduced legislation that will bring equal protection in employment to the handicapped under the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Under existing law, there is no generally applicable prohibition against employment discrimination on the basis of handicap. Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, sex or national origin: but it provides no protection for disabled workers. The widespread exclusion of handicapped workers from employment exacts an enormous toll in terms of human dignity and the quality of life for countless Americans. Over 16 million people age 18 to 64 years reported some level of work disability in the 1976 census. Of this handicapped population, there were only 7.1 million persons working. It is vital to realize that most of these people desire employment but do not work because of unjust and discriminatory hiring policies.

The handicapped face the dilemma of being discriminated against in employment opportunities because they are evaluated on the basis of false generalizations, misconceptions and misinformation about their handicap; not on the basis of their job skills, productivity or performance. Qualified individuals, time and again, are denied employment because of their disability when the disability would in no way interfere with their job performance. Our handicapped deserve the opportunity to be evaluated and hired on the basis of their ability and not their handicap.

The need for this legislation is obvious. There are too many employers who still will not hire an otherwise qualified individual for the sole reason of his or her disability. Some employers cling to the myths related to hiring the handicapped. Fears of increased insurance rates, lower job performance, job stability, poor attendance and the required physical adjustment turn employers away from hiring the handicapped. This unnecessary situation weighs a heavy cost on society. In 1980, it was estimated that the Federal Government spent approximately $1 out of every $13 in the Federal budget—40 billion—to support our disabled population. State, local and private support for disabled citizens amounts to approximately an additional $60 billion. Surely by eliminating employment discrimination of the handicapped we can help reduce this economic burden on taxpayers. Additionally, and more importantly, by enacting this legislation we can help reduce the loss in human terms that is caused by discrimination against handicapped individuals. Too many deserving people are excluded from society's mainstream and left to lose their dignity and self-worth.

The time has come to include handicapped individuals as a protected element in our population under title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964; protecting handicapped persons against all forms of employment discrimination under that title. We must demonstrate our Nation's firm commitment to ending discrimination against the handicapped by enacting this legislation. I hope my colleagues will support me in my effort to give the handicapped an equal opportunity in employment.

Text of the bill follows:

H.R. 370

A bill to amend title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to make discrimination against handicapped individuals an unlawful employment practice

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a reference in section 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6 of this Act to a section or other provision is a reference to a section or other provision of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

MEDICARE VISION REFORM ACT

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, along with many of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, legislation to correct a glaring inequity in the Medicare law. This bill, the Medicare Vision Reform Act, would inject a dose of competition into the delivery of eye/vision services under Medicare, and provide substantial savings to many Medicare beneficiaries.

The Medicare Program currently covers eye/vision services provided by doctors of medicine or osteopathy, except for routine eye examinations and refractive services. With the exception of services provided to post-cataract patients, these same services are not covered when provided by a doctor of optometry, even if the services are within the scope of State licensing laws under which the optometrist practices. The result of this inconsistency is that Medicare beneficiaries who choose a doctor of optometry for their eye/vision care, either because they have always gone to that provided or there are no doctors of medicine or osteopathy readily accessible, are forced to pay out-of-pocket expenses for services that are in essence covered benefits. Such a denial of benefits on the arbitrary basis of accessibility to a covered provider is patently unfair to Medicare beneficiaries and clearly inconsistent with the intent of the Medicare Program, or even its opening section, which states:

Any individual entitled to insurance benefits under this title may obtain health services from any institution, agency, or person qualified to participate under this title if such institution, agency, or person undertakes to provide him such services.

My bill will correct this situation by covering eye/vision services under Medicare when provided by any practitioner licensed under State law to provide the services.

My bill also addresses a growing concern of mine—the substantial and growing difference between what Medicare recognizes as the reasonable charge for eye/vision services and the charge actually billed to the patient. For currently included practitioners it is estimated that Medicare reasonable charges are only 77.5 percent of actual charges: Thus Medicare patients are paying nearly one-fourth of the actual charge in addition to their 20-percent coinsurance charge. This amounts to millions of dollars out of pocket to pay more than what Medicare has recognized as the reasonable charge. My bill would correct this problem by requiring that all practitioners who provide ambulatory eye/vision services, as a condition for receiving Medicare reimbursement for such services, accept the Medicare-determined reasonable charge as the full charge, and not bill the patient for any amount in excess of the reasonable charge except for the 20-percent coinsurance.

This legislation is not an expansion of Medicare covered services, Mr. Speaker. The services are already covered; we are merely seeking here to make sure all beneficiaries are treated fairly in obtaining these services. Further, as currently drafted, the bill would be budget neutral.

Mr. Speaker, last Congress, I introduced similar legislation which would have gone one-step further and provided Medicare coverage for routine eye examinations. That bill, H.R. 3010, was the focus of hearings by the Energy and Commerce Health Subcommittee and attracted the support of an impressive list of organizations, including the American Public Health Association and the American Association of Retired Persons. I remain a firm believer in the long-term value and cost effectiveness of providing this care, but I am also sensitive to the up-front costs involved in these times of budgetary constraint. It is my sincere hope this Congress will address the inequity in the current program, and future Congresses will focus on the real value of preventive care in the coming years.●

FAMILY FARMER REFORM ACT OF 1985

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call my colleagues' attention to the Family Farmer Reform Act of 1985, H.R. 2318; which I am introducing today to address the plight of the small farmers, who like the small urban businesses, are the major producers of goods and services in this Nation. We all need each other for mutual survival and growth.

As a Representative from an urban district, I became especially interested in the plight of the family farmer when Michigan farmers came to Detroit 2 years ago and contributed over 50 tons of food to hungry and unemployed workers who had exhausted their public benefits.

That was the beginning of an important urban-rural coalition which, like others similar to it, continues to grow and expand throughout the Nation at a time when we increasingly face hardships imposed by this administration's deficit-ridden economy; 3 weeks ago, a group of about 50 community leaders from Detroit, MI, toured hog and dairy farms and discussed agricultural problems with family farmers. The Detroit delegation then invited farmers to visit the urban community in May, and collectively, they are seeking solutions for the revitalization of our State and National economies.

The urban and labor population must express concerns about the well-being of the farm and rural worker because some 22 million jobs in industry are dependent upon agriculture. Agriculture is the largest single portion of the Nation's export portfolio which accounts for jobs in its own right. Most industrial States, as well as farm States, have major agriculture sectors. Moreover, when farmers go broke, they do not buy equipment and products made by workers, and workers cannot purchase sufficient agriculture products.

A chilling economic wind is sweeping across rural America, uprooting farm and ranch families at rate unseen since the depths of the Great Depression. More than a quarter of a million producers have already been swept from the land by the turbulence of the past 4 years. And the wind grows more harsh with each passing day. At the rate we are going, less than 1 million farms will survive to the turn of the century, and half of our food production will be controlled by only 1 percent of the farm population. The statistics of recent failures within the agricultural sector are grim evidence that our national economic policy is seriously misguided. Here are some startling examples:

Nearly 200,000 farmers have gone out of business since 1981;

Net farm income fell to $16.1 billion in 1983, the lowest level since the depression;

For the first time since the 1930's, farmers' interest payments last year exceeded their income.

Between 1980 to 1983, the value of farmland fell, the first time since the depression that land values declined for 3 straight years; and

The aggregate farm debt is expected to reach a record $215 billion this year.

One of the greatest problems of immediate concern facing America's family farmers is the debt crisis many of them find themselves in today. More than 30 percent of America's farmers are in desperate financial shape, with another 30 to 40 percent facing accelerating financial problems in the next few months.

In Michigan, farmers are calling for the passage of an emergency Federal appropriation to prevent some 12 percent of the State's farmers from going out of business. Although in 1980, Michigan farm income was $820 million, it had dropped to $690 million in 1984. Only in the last 90 days, the caseload of farm loan requests have doubled. Michigan farmers reported recently that four different small banks have refused them loans, and this problem is affecting all categories of farmers in the State. One Michigan farmer stated that he is in more than $450,000 debt, and that even the veterinarian in his county is going out of business because of the depressed agricultural prices.

Now, increasing numbers of American family farmers are in need to support. The critical debt situation in rural America has come about because of continuing low commodity prices, unacceptably high interest rates, overproduction coupled with a lack of effective demand for their products. The small- and medium-size farmers call for several immediate actions which I fully support and which is reflected in the Family Farmer Reform Act of 1985 which I am proposing.

First, existing loans must be reamortized or rescheduled for the longest period of time possible. Second, interest rates must be lowered to a level which will achieve repayability. Third, deferral of some of the debt may be needed until such time as farm income will permit reinstatement.

Among the numerous advantages of this bill are the following: It is a zero subsidy program which satisfies both farmers and taxpayers, neither of whom like subsidies. This program places the price floors at the real cost of production, controls the volume of production, eliminates subsidy payments and allows farmers to recover their costs in the marketplace, not from the Treasury.

It is a market-oriented bill designed to limit production of the designated storable commodities to actual domestic and foreign market demand, plus whatever volume is required to maintain an adequate reserve.

It is targeted to true family farms. The most innovative component of the program is the progressive set-aside mechanism which gives small- and medium-size farmers first crack at producing for actual demand. In essence, the larger a producer is, based upon gross income level, the higher the percentage of his base acreage he would be required to remove from production in times of surplus.

H.R. 2318 would restructure farm debt to allow realistic repayment, and in fact requires that debt-ridden farmers be given extended payout periods and lower effective interest rates in order to allow them to service their debts rather than face bankruptcy or foreclosure. It also calls for a temporary moratorium on foreclosures by Government lenders to give these producers breathing room until the new supply management and price structure are implemented.

It provides a simple, no-subsidy farmer disaster reserve program. This self-help crop insurance program would require all producers of designated storable commodities to contribute a small percentage of their annual production into a farmer disaster reserve [FDR] which they could draw on in times of natural disaster. This program would serve to stabilize the volume of each of the commodities hitting the market each year, thus cushioning consumers and livestock producers from shortage-induced price increases.

This proposal is predictable, uncomplicated, and flexible. Each year, past production and projected needs would be calculated and the production goals for the upcoming crop year would be determined and adjusted through a simple formula. Thereby, producers, bankers, and farm suppliers would know far ahead of time precisely how much of each crop a farmer can grow and what the price floors will be. The whole farm sector can plan with confidence.

The Family Farmer Reform Act of 1985 requires sound soil conservation practices. All producers would set aside a percentage of their base acreage from production and implement approved conservation practices on the set-aside land. It includes provisions for encouraging stronger protection of scarce ground water resources.

In this era of severe international drought and starvation, this proposal addresses world hunger responsibilities. The current crisis in Africa reflects the continuing need for both disaster relief and for long-term agricultural development in many poorer nations. Until the 1980's more than half of all food aid distributed in the world was supplied by the United States. In determining annual production quotas, this program should again anticipate that our responsibility would be to provide on the order of 51 percent of the needed food aid projected annually by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations. This aid should be coordinated with other exporting nations through multilateral agreements. In addition, the United States should increase the level of technical assistance provided to nations which are committed to increasing their indigenous agricultural production capability.

Finally, this legislation calls for 90-percent parity, not charity, coupled with strict conservation measures so we can preserve our soil and water for future generations. In short, we must save our family farmers now, or all America will lose.●

HIGHER EDUCATION: THE REMARKABLE HISTORY OF BLACK COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about the impact this administration's education cuts will have on historically black colleges and universities. This administration has proposed cuts of over $700 million. It is estimated that over 190,000 New Yorkers will be removed from the Pell Grant and Guaranteed Student Loan Programs. Higher education seems destined to be the domain of the wealthy. Under these cuts Medgar Evers College, in New York, will not be able to continue to make quality education available to the college-bound poor and middle-income student who seeks a better way of life. The viable financial future of this country's black institutions is uncertain. Executive Order 12320, signed in 1981, ensures black participation in federally sponsored programs, but financial assistance will be needed from the private sector as well.

Solid fundraising progress has given the United Negro College Fund a national and international reputation. Empowered with the dynamics needed to promote the educational welfare of our black colleges, they have become the life insurance these colleges and their students need. At a time when education associations question the quality and standards of higher education, it is a little known fact that our black colleges and universities have been consistent in their support for strong liberal arts curriculums. Our black colleges are valuable resources.

I have a deep respect for the role black colleges and universities have played in our society; many graduates of black institutions are at the top echelons of their professions. From Supreme Court Justice Mr. Thurgood Marshall, to novelist Ms. Toni Morrison and soprano Ms. Leonthyne Price, to Olympic medalist Mr. Edwin Moses, the outstanding accomplishments of these black Americans have been immense and their contributions invaluable. One of the greatest Americans to ever live was the product of one of our black colleges—Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.; his intellect and his leadership made Americans proud.

Private and public support is paramount toward better historically black colleges and universities. I submit the following article, by Washington Post columnist Mr. William Raspberry, for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 17, 1985]

A LITTLE LIFE INSURANCE FOR BLACK COLLEGES

(By William Raspberry)

Black colleges, typically small and underfunded, are seldom in a position to refuse financial assistance—even when it it clear that the help will create nearly intractable problems down the road.

Frederick Douglass Patterson understands the dilemma well, having experienced it as a president of Tuskegee Institute and founder of the United Negro College Fund. Now the 83-year-old "retired" educator, with a generous assist from the insurance industry, is embarked on a program to do something about it.

"The chronic problem which our colleges face," he was saying the other day during a visit here from New York, "is that if you go to the foundations—the most likely source of financial assistance—you find they won't give to endowments. They give you restricted gifts, restricted both as to purpose and as to the time frame of expenditure.

"Still the gifts are received with gratitude, since there are very few things you can do for an undernourished undergraduate college that do not improve the quality of what they are trying to do. You're glad to have the quality, but then you're out of money to sustain the improvements.

"You may find that you've built into your operation better salaries for teachers, more books for the library, more science equipment, more of this, more of that—whatever the rating agencies say you need. Then you find yourself out of funds . . . so you end up financially worse off than you were before you got the money."

That was the dilemma. The solution: The College Endowment Funding Plan, a piece of financial wizardry that allows a college to turn an initial fundraising effort of $300,000 into an endowment of more than $2 million in the space of 25 years, while drawing out $30,000 every year for current expenditures.

The key to the magic is the participation of the life and health insurance industry, whose members Patterson persuaded to make long-term, below-market-rate loans in multiples of $400,000.

It works this way: a participating college is eligible for a $50,000 bonus from the United Negro College Fund and a loan of $400,000 from an insurance company for each $300,000 unit the college is able to raise on its own. The $750,000 package is invested in long-term, high-quality, fixed-interest securities, with the interest (minus the $30,000-a-year in operating costs) plowed back.

For the first 15 years, the college pays only the interest (at two percentage points below market) on the loan. By the time the loan is fully repaid, the insurance company has made a decent return on its $400,000 investment and the college, which already has used $750,000 in operating money has an endowment fund of nearly $2 million for each initial $300,000 unit.

"The first company to join the plan—Aetna—wanted to give us the money," Patterson said. "I told them we didn't want it as a gift because we needed the leverage of a loan to wake up the trustees of these colleges and get people out scrapping for the money. Besides, there wouldn't be enough companies willing to give us that kind of money. A safe loan with a good return is a different proposition.

"The reason for the $30,000 annual drawdown is that no college as hard up as these are is going to be very enthusiastic about the plan if they can't get something every year."

So far, enthusiasm has not been a problem, for either the colleges or the insurance companies. Thirty-one companies have made loans to 29 colleges, some of which have taken as many as five or six units. The $37.5 million invested to date is expected to produce endowments totaling well over $100 million in 25 years.

"It's been a phenomenally successful experience, especially for those small colleges that could never even dream of building an endowment," Patterson said. "Now if we could only get the rest of the private sector to get involved to the same extent . . ."●

PLYWOOD TARIFFS

HON. DON BONKER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to close a loophole in the U.S. Tariff Schedule that is needlessly and unfairly costing jobs in the Pacific Northwest wood processing industry. Left uncorrected, the job toll stemming from this problem will steadily increase.

This legislation is identical to H.R. 5182, a bill which I introduced in the 98th Congress to address this problem. In the last session, H.R. 5182 was incorporated into the Omnibus Tariff and Trade Act prepared by the Ways and Means Committee. As part of that measure, this legislation passed the Ways and Means Committee and the full House of Representatives. Unfortunately, this provision was dropped at the 11th hour in the House-Senate conference.

Let me briefly describe the problem my bill would correct: Currently, certain plywood sheets are being exported by Canada to the United States as building boards rather than as plywood under the U.S. tariff schedule. This subjects such Canadian exports to a much lower tariff schedule, making the products cheaper than comparable plywood produced in the United States. The tariff category called building boards was apparently intended to be a residual one for special-use construction panels that might not fall into either plywood or wood veneer panel categories.

Instead, it has become a loophole category. In the course of last year's hearings, Congress found that by simply altering the edge of a plywood sheet, foreign producers are able to get their products categorized as building boards, qualifying for the dramatically lower tariff treatment. In theory, the edgework dedicates the sheet to some unspecified special construction use. In fact, the use of such sheets is no different than plywood sheets with plain edges.

My legislation would revise the building board category to insure that it is used only for special-use panels and not for plywood. This revision makes the U.S. tariff schedule for these products conform more closely to the international code, which contains no building board category at all. Maintenance of a building board category in the United States Code would only frustrate efforts to insure internationally recognized tariff categories, and continue to damage our own wood products industry.

While the tariff on plywood is a flat 20 percent, the so-called building boards, used as plywood, are exported subject to a tariff of 1.9 cents per pound plus 3.4 percent. The plywood industry estimates that this schedule equals a flat 10-percent tariff. Under the U.S. tariff schedule, even that reduced level will continue to decrease dramatically.

While the volumes imported from Canada under this category represents only a small portion of plywood products marketed in the United States, the volume jumped an alarming 74 percent in 1982. My greatest concern is, as the tariff schedule decreases, the practice of exporting plywood under the building board category may spread to all forms of plywood exported by Canada to the United States. Such a practice would be devastating to our industry.

As many of the Members know, rapidly rising and heavily subsidized, Canadian wood products has aroused a great deal of concern within the U.S. industry, Congress, and the administration.

I have introduced in this Congress H.R. 1648, a bill to accelerate ongoing negotiations between the United States and Canadian Governments, and eliminate the deep subsidy provided to Canadian manufacturers.

The legislation I am introducing today does not deal with the overreaching problem of unfair Canadian subsidies; instead, it attempts to eliminate a loophole in our own tariff schedule that manufacturers in Canada and other nations can export, unfairly, to the severe detriment of our manufacturers and our wood products work force. I would point out, however, that the two problems are related. When you add this tariff loophole to the subsidy advantages already enjoyed by Canadian manufacturers, it creates a tremendously unfair situation.

As many of the Members know, rapidly rising and heavily subsidized Canadian wood products exports has aroused a great deal of concern within the U.S. industry, Congress, and the administration. The legislation I am introducing should not be regarded as protectionist or a reversal of the industry's free trade position. Rather, this bill is a loophole closer. It brings the U.S. Tariff Schedule into closer conformity with international standards, restoring equal treatment of plywood products in the U.S. market for both foreign and domestic producers. For this reason, the legislation has the specific support and endorsement of the American Plywood Association, which represents both small and large U.S. plywood producers.

I am hopeful, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Ways and Means will include this proposal in the group of miscellaneous tariff bills that it recommends favorable to the House for passage before the end of this Congress.

A copy of the proposed legislation follows:

H.R. 2324

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. TARIFF TREATMENT OF CERTAIN TYPES OF PLYWOOD.

Headnote 1 of part 3 of schedule 2 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States is amended—

(2) in paragraph (c) by inserting immediately before the semicolon at the end thereof the following: "or any edge of which has been tongued, grooved, lapped, or otherwise worked"; and

(3) in paragraph (3) by striking out "chiefly used in the construction of walls, ceilings, or other parts of buildings" and inserting in lieu thereof "other than plywood, wood-veneer panels, or cellular panels".

POSTAL REVIEW BILL INTRODUCED

HON. JOHN E. GROTBERG

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. GROTBERG. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced legislation increasing congressional authority to review changes in postal service proposed by the U.S. Postal Service. My bill would require the Postal Service to submit to Congress any substantial nationwide service changes that are being proposed, such as elimination of 6-day delivery or the closing of small post offices. If either House of Congress vetoed the proposal, the Postal Service would be prohibited from implementing it.

Regardless of where we as individuals may stand on the issue of 6-day delivery, the clusterbox concept, or the closing of small post offices, recent proposals by the Postal Service have made clear the need for a procedure that explicitly provides for congressional review of major Postal Service policy changes. Congress has had an extremely difficult time obtaining enough information on which to base a decision as to the value of these various proposals. This inability to adequately evaluate Postal Service proposals plagues Congress. One thing is clear—Congress does not have, but does need, and established procedure for reviewing service change proposals put forth by the Postal Service.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to consider this legislation. Let's develop a system of checks and balances to thwart any ill-advised USPS initiatives. I am including the text of the bill at this point:

H.R. 2302

A BILL To amend title 39 of the United States Code to provide for congressional review of proposed changes in postal services

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3661 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by striking out subsections (b) and (c) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new subsections:

"(b) When the Postal Service determines that there should be a change in the nature of postal services, and such a change would have nationwide or substantially nationwide impact, the Postal Service shall transmit to the Congress a detailed statement of the proposed change, including an estimate of the impact of such change upon the public, business mail users, service levels, and postal finances. The statement shall be delivered to both Houses on the same day and to each House while it is in session except that no more than two proposed changes in the nature of postal services may be pending before the Congress at one time. A change in the nature of postal services proposed by the Postal Service is effective at the end of the first period of 60 calendar days of continuous session of the Congress after the date on which the change is transmitted to the Congress, or at such later time as may be determined by the Postal Service, unless either House passes between the date of transmittal and the end of the 60-day period a resolution stating its disapproval of the proposed change, the matter after the resolving clause of which is as follows: "That ———— disapproves the proposal dealing with the matter of ———— which proposal was transmitted by the Postal Services to the Congress on ————.', the first blank being filled with the appropriate House of the Congress, the second blank being filled with the title of the proposal and such further description as may be necessary to identify it, and the third blank being filled with the date of transmittal to the Congress.

"(c) For the purpose of subsection (b) of this section—

"(1) the continuity of a session is broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die; and

"(2) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 3 days to a day certain are excluded in the computation of the 60-day period referred to in subsection (b) of this section.

"(d) Resolutions of disapproval described in subsection (b) of this section shall, upon introduction, be immediately referred by the presiding officer of each House of the Congress to the standing committee having oversight and legislative responsiblity with respect to the Postal Service in accordance with the rules of the respective House.

"(e)(1) For the purpose of this section, a change in the nature of postal services includes—

"(A) a reduction in the number of days each week mail is delivered to postal customers over city, rural, or star routes;

"(B) a reduction in the number of days each week and hours each day post offices are open to the public to transact business;

"(C) an increase in the periods of time used as the standard for the timely delivery of mail matter;

"(D) a change in the standards of eligibility to receive mail by city, rural, or star route delivery;

"(E) a change in the standards used to determine post office closings; and

"(F) changes in other levels and types of postal services which have been provided to the public generally.

"(2) For the purpose of this section, a nationwide or substantially nationwide change in the nature of postal services includes any change which has effect in more than one administrative region established by the Postal Service.

"(f) Subsections (b) through (e) of this section are enacted by Congress—

"(1) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the House of Representatives and the Senate, respectively, and as such they are deemed a part of the rules of each House, respectively, but applicable only with respect to the procedure to be followed in that House in the case of resolutions described in subsection (b) of this section; and they supersede other rules only to the extent that they are inconsistent therewith; and

"(2) with full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change the rules (so far as relating to the procedure of that House) at any time, in the same manner and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of that House.".

SEC. 2. The amendment made by the first section of this Act shall apply only with respect to any change in the nature of postal services which is proposed after the date of the enactment of this Act or which has not become effective as of that date.●

OUTSTANDING YOUTH

HON. DON SUNDQUIST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues an outstanding youth from Henderson County, TN. Tony Johnson, son of Jerry and Nadell Johnson, will be representing our country later this month on a European excursion as part of the Future Farmers of America Program.

As Doris Jarrett, columnist for the Lexington Progress, said, "Those who criticize our young people of today should take a look at Tony Johnson."

Of the 22,000 contestants who attended the FFA convention last year in Kansas City, only 22 won awards—and Tony was among those honored. He received the 1984 National Fish and Wildlife Management Proficiency Award.

The 21-day overseas trip he won as a result will include visits to six countries: West Germany, Belgium, The Netherlands, Luxembourg, France and Switzerland. In addition to sightseeing, the students will meet with agricultural officials of the countries—and will stay in farm homes chosen for their suitability.

The Lexington Progress article I mentioned above also highlighted these facts about this fine young man:

Winning honors and trophies is nothing new to Tony. He began his 4-H Club work in elementary school. During his freshman year at Lexington High School, he was chosen president of 4-H Wildlife Project Group and treasurer of the local 4-H Club. Later he become a member of FFA.

He was president of his sophomore, junior and senior classes of the large Lexington High School. He won countless honors and awards through his affiliation with 4-H Clubs and FFA. In the senior class, he was chosen as Most Likely to Succeed, Most Intellectual and Most Dependable.

He is president of his church youth group . . . He is the recipient of a Leadership Scholarship to the University of Tennessee at Martin . . . He was elected state Commissioner of Agriculture at Boys' State . . . He was named to Who's Who Among American High School Students . . . and the list goes on.

Mr. Speaker, I'm extremely proud of the accomplishments of this bright young man. His awards and honors are a source of pride to his family and community—and these deeds should serve as inspiration for other youngsters to emulate.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

HEALTH MAINTENANCE ORGANIZATIONS AND MEDICARE: SPEEDING UP THE PROCESS FOR THOSE WHO CHOOSE TO DISENROLL

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today which I believe will strengthen the promising partnership between health maintenance organizations (HMO's) and the Medicare Program. This legislation, which will cut to 2 weeks the maximum delay in returning an HMO member to their standard Medicare coverage, addresses a serious shortcoming of current Federal law.

A recent report by the General Accounting Office and a subsequent investigation and hearing by the Subcommittee on Health and Long-Term Care of the House Select Committee on Aging, which I have the privilege to chair, revealed serious inadequacies in the Federal Government's oversight of Medicare-participating HMO's. Among the problems identified were substantial delays in the time required to effectively disenroll Medicare HMO members. At a hearing held by the subcommittee last week, we heard the stories of seniors who had experienced delays ranging from 2 months to 2 years between their formal request to disenroll and their final disenrollment and return to standard Medicare coverage.

As identified in the GAO report, a good deal of these delays can be attributed to mismanagement of the recording of enrollment and disenrollment information by the Health Care Financing Administration. However, a significant portion of these delays is required by current law. Under provisions of title 18 of the Social Security Act, a Medicare beneficiary must wait between 1 to 2 months for their request for disenrollment to become effective.

This is simply too restrictive. If an individual is dissatisfied with the health care they are receiving, for whatever reason, he or she should be able to promptly change health care providers. Therefore, I believe that current law must be amended to allow for a more reasonable waiting period.

A 2-week waiting period, while longer than I would like, appears to be the most reasonable alternative. A number of States have been very successful in keeping to a maximum delay of 2 weeks during similar HMO experiments under the Medicaid Program, and I see no reason why the Health Care Financing Administration should not be able to match the States in efficiency.

HMO's offer the promise of a wider range of services to Medicare beneficiaries while at the same time helping to control rising health care costs for seniors and the Federal Government. We must, therefore, strengthen this promising partnership while still in its infancy.

I strongly urge my colleagues' support for this most important and timely reform legislation.●

THE SOCIAL SECURITY PROTECTION ACT

HON. RONNIE G. FLIPPO

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce legislation today that would establish an independent agency for Social Security effective October 1, 1985.

The Social Security Program is presently slated for removal from the unified Federal budget in 1993 under a provision of the Social Security Amendments Act of 1983. There is no reason to wait until 1993 to make Social Security an independent agency. The time has come to remove this immensely valuable and successful program from the unified budget.

The Social Security Program is not part of the deficit problem and should not be part of the solution. This program is different from most other programs in the unified budget. The Social Security Program pays its own way.

In 1977 and again in 1983, the Congress enacted substantial increases in the payroll tax, reduced benefits and made other changes necessary to insure the financial viability of the Social Security Programs.

The huge increase in the highly regressive payroll tax was accepted by the American people as necessary to protect the benefits of the 36 million senior citizens who depend on this program for financial security and independence.

The American people accepted this tax increase on the basis that the revenues would be used only to protect the Social Security Program. No one, and Mr. Speaker, I emphasize no one, suggested or even considered for 1 minute that the revenues from this huge tax increase would be used for proposes other than restoring and maintaining the financial health of the Social Security Programs.

Some are now suggesting that cuts in the Social Security COLA are necessary to help reduce the deficit. This line of reasoning does not make sense. It would amount to a diversion of revenues raised for specific purposes to fulfill specific promises to subsidize other Federal spending programs. This would be unfair.

The working men and women of the United States are being asked to overpay for Social Security to meet other Government needs. This would amount to fraud.

Mr. Speaker, a separate trust fund for Social Security was established by amendments to the Social Security Act passed in 1939. Other distinct trust funds were established for the disability insurance and Medicare programs when they were enacted.

These trust funds were established to protect the programs and to guarantee that the revenues collected through a special tax would be used for the purposes specified in the Social Security Act and would not be commingled with other revenues and diverted for other purposes.

We have honored this trust for almost 50 years. We should not violate this trust now for short-term political gains.

For 30 years, between 1939 and 1969, the Social Security trust funds were maintained separate from the Federal budget. This was no accident. It simply recognized the fact that the trust funds do not belong to the Government. The Federal Government acts only as trustee for the funds. The trust fund is simply the depository of revenues raised by a specified tax for a specific purpose. The trust fund couples the benefits and costs of programs more closely. Most importantly it assures the beneficiaries that trust fund benefits once established will be protected.

Even President Hoover recognized the importance of separating trust funds from the budget. Prior to 1932 there was only one concept of the Federal budget which included general, special, emergency, and trust accounts. President Hoover in 1932, created the so-called "Administrative" budget separating trust funds from other expenditures.

The trust funds, including Social Security, were maintained separate from other expenditures for the next 36 years. The trust funds, including Social Security, were consolidated into a unified Federal budget in 1969.

The development and implementation of the unified budget followed the recommendations of the President's Commission on Budget Concepts. This Commission created by President Johnson in 1967 recommended changes in the Federal budget designed to "enhance public and congressional understanding of the budget, and will increase its usefulness for purposes of decisionmaking, public policy determination, and financial understanding."

The Commission on Budget Concepts recommended that the trust funds be included in the unified budget but in doing so recognized that:

Individual trust funds must be accounted for separately, and that their activities must be reported on in a way which allows the identity and integrity of trust fund transactions and balances be preserved.

Mr. Speaker, recent actions suggest that the integrity of the Social Security trust funds are under attack. The intentions of the Commission are not being fulfilled.

Many recognized early on that including the Social Security Program in a unified budget was a mistake. Incorporating Social Security in a unified budget did not enhance "decision making public policy determination, and financial understanding" as envisioned by the President's Commission on Budget Concepts. It simply compromised the integrity of the Social Security trust funds and confused the public.

Many suspect that the Social Security Programs were included in the unified budget in 1969 simply to produce a budget surplus in that fiscal year. Efforts have been underway since that time to remove the Social Security system from the unified budget. Bills were introduced to accomplish this goal in the early 1970's.

The National Commission on Social Security created by the Social Security Amendments Act of 1977, recommended in 1981 that an independent agency be created in the belief that "significant improvements in the operating of Social Security Programs and the public's understanding of those programs would result."

This theme was reiterated in 1983 in the report of the National Commission on Social Security Reform. The so-called Greenspan Commission concluded that "* * * the operations of the OASI, DI, HI, and SMI Trust Funds should be removed from the unified budget." The Greenspan Commission reasoned that changes in Social Security should be made only for programmatic reasons, not to balance the budget. By separating Social Security out of the budget, the policy of making changes in Social Security only for programmatic reasons would be protected.

Congress followed this recommendation of the Greenspan Commission and included a provision in the Social Security Amendments Act of 1983 creating an independent Social Security agency. This act also created a congressional panel on Social Security organization to undertake a "thorough study with respect to the implementation of removing the Social Security Administration from the Department of Health and Human Services and establishing it as an independent agency * * *". The report of this panel issued last year has provided a transition plan to establish an independent agency for Social Security.

Mr. Speaker, there is no reason to further delay separating Social Security from the unified budget. In fact, we cannot afford further delay. The danger to the Social Security Programs is clear. We must act now to maintain the integrity of the trust funds.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill. It would protect these people depending on Social Security benefits as well as those paying Social Security taxes. It is necessary to act now to guarantee once and for all the integrity of the Social Security trust funds.●

SLAMMING THE TRADE DOOR SHUT ON NICARAGUA

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, on April 19, 1985, I wrote a letter to President Reagan recommending that our Government immediately cut off all trade with Nicaragua. His response to my suggestions was swift and to the point. I commend him for his action. As a supporter of democracy, peace, and stability in that neighboring region, I was deeply disturbed to learn that the United States is importing millions of dollars of products from that Marxist-Leninist country, and exporting badly needed equipment and spare parts to Nicaragua.

I believe that trade can be effectively used by our Government as a form of pressure to encourage the Sandinistas to moderate their behavior and really seek a peaceful solution to the difficulties in that nearby region.

I learned today that the President moved ahead on this question and issued an Executive order prohibiting trade and other transactions with Nicaragua.

I commend the President for his swift action in terminating trade with that country, and commend him for his responsiveness to our congressional urgings. This is a step in the right direction.

Should Mr. Ortega fail to respond to the cessation of commerce with our country, other forms of pressure could be brought to bear on his regime to isolate, both economically and diplomatically, that Communist country.

With these comments in mind, I urge my colleagues to read the following Executive order from the President:

EXECUTIVE ORDER PROHIBITING TRADE AND CERTAIN OTHER TRANSACTIONS INVOLVING NICARAGUA

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1701 et seq.), the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1601 et seq.), chapter 12 of Title 50 of the United States Code (50 U.S.C. 191 et seq.), and section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code,

I, Ronald Reagan, President of the United States of America, find that the policies and actions of the Government of Nicaragua constitute an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States and hereby declare a national emergency to deal with that threat.

I hereby prohibit all imports into the United States of goods and services of Nicaraguan origin; all exports from the United States of goods to or destined for Nicaragua, except those destined for the organized democratic resistance, and transactions relating thereto.

I hereby prohibit Nicaraguan air carriers from engaging in air transportation to or from points in the United States, and transactions relating thereto.

In addition, I hereby prohibit vessels of Nicaraguan registry from entering into United States ports, and transactions relating thereto.

The Secretary of the Treasury is delegated and authorized to employ all powers granted to me by the International Emergency Economic Powers Act to carry out the purposes of this Order.

The prohibitions set forth in this Order shall be effective as of 12:01 a.m., Eastern Daylight Time, May 7, 1985, and shall be transmitted to the Congress and published in the Federal Register.

RONALD REAGAN.

SPEECH BEFORE THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

REMARKS BY HON. NORMAN F. LENT, BEFORE THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE, APRIL 28, 1985

Chairman Abe Krasnoff, President-elect Sig Spiegel, President Myron Conovitz, Jack Goldberg, County Executive Purcell, reverend clergy, Monsignor Hartman, my good friends and colleagues, distinguished guests, members, and friends of the Anti-Defamation League, fellow Democrats and fellow Republicans.

I'm truly honored and privileged to once again join you for tonight's memorable occasion, and I'm especially happy to be a part of a program to pay well-deserved tribute to my good friend, Lionel Goldberg, this year's recipient of the ADL's Distinguished Community Service Award.

No one is more deserving of this great honor than Lionel. He successfully balances a busy career as senior vice president of Alexander and Alexander of New York with an active role in our local community. He devotes endless time and energy to numerous charities, educational, health and public service organizations. I've known Lionel for many years and, believe me, I speak from personal experience in saying that Lionel Goldberg epitomizes the essence of the ADL and all it stands for.

Since its beginnings almost 72 years ago, the ADL has been in the forefront of the cause for human rights. No organization has done more to overcome the evils of hate, bigotry, and prejudice in the world than the ADL. And, no organization has made a greater contribution to America's precious heritage of freedom, equality and justice for all. Here, on Long Island, we are especially proud of our Long Island Regional Board which, under the able leadership of Myron Conovitz and Rabbi Arthur Seltzer, has acted with dispatch and vigor and sensitivity in case after case whenever bigotry and racism rear their ugly heads.

In a few days, we celebrate VE Day—the end of World War II—the end of the nightmare. Last week, in ceremonies at the Capitol and throughout the country, Americans observed the 40th anniversary of the end of the Holocaust and the liberation of Nazi death camps at the end of World War II. We all share a deep and profound concern about the need to remember the cruel and inhuman tragedies of the Holocaust and the Nazi annihilation of 6 million innocent Jews.

Unfortunately, this time of remembrance has been marred by the controversy generated by the President's stated intention to visit a German military cemetery at Bitburg. Bitburg—a place no one had heard of until a few days ago—has, to the sorrow of everyone, opened old wounds and driven a wedge between the Nation and the President.

Some—including the White House—would portray the Bitburg controversy as an issue of primary concern to the Jewish community. But that is inaccurate. Others portray it as an issue of primary concern to the major veteran's organizations. But that also is inaccurate and incomplete.

What has come out of the White House in the face of the outcry disappoints me greatly. What disappoints me—and I believe disappoints the overwhelming majority of the American people—far beyond the initial insensitive stumble into Bitburg—is the apparent determination by the White House staff to treat injured Jews—and outraged veterans—as two separate and distinct special interest groups—sort of like separate groups seeking a special permit for a parade. They are both viewed as groups looking for some special advantage—and not for what is right and just.

It is the obligation of every President—even a President without the incredible gifts of this President—to communicate and to unify. It is the obligation of the President to explain to the Nation why the concerns of Jews and veterans are the concerns of all Americans. His obligation is to instruct; to take what seems like the stuff of special interest politics and, with it, construct a monument to American morality—a statement of who we are as a people; what we cherish; why American soldiers died during World War II; and why the Holocaust was not just something Germans did to Jews, but something people did to people. It diminished us all!

If this opportunity is squandered—if the President simply attends to Bitburg as presently scheduled—he goes to Germany a President representing something less than all his people. I say this with great sadness—because I admire the President, I've campaigned with him, and I've supported most of his economic and foreign policies.

It is still not too late to change matters; to respond to the pleas which deluge him, including my own, to cancel the trip to Bitburg and substitute something else.

The President could honor the anti-Nazi movement. He could honor the Germans who have worked 40 years to bury the Nazi past and place West Germany firmly in the ranks of the Western democracies. He could toast the Germany of Hegel and Beethoven, of Einstein and Weill—the towering cultures of the past and the promise of the future.

But to salute such a nation, the President must first unify his own! In life, we all have our assignments. This is now Ronald Reagan's obligation.

I have talked about this unpleasant subject at some length because I know that it weighs heavily on your mind and because you want—and are entitled—to know what your elected officials think about the issue. I am very much disturbed about the situation and my concern goes beyond this moment, beyond the public relations Dunkirk we see unfolding. What I mean is, we can ill afford a rift between the President and the Jewish community at this point with 3½ years remaining in the second Reagan administration. It's absolutely essential, in my view, that we try to make some progress toward a Middle East peace settlement in this second term. An effective U.S. policy in the region requires the support of the Jewish community and the Bitburg affair has unfortunately undermined the trust in the Jewish community for a President who has proven himself to be a staunch friend of Israel.

At a time when more and more Arab nations are showing an interest in direct negotiations with Israel, it is important that we quickly form a consensus around an effective U.S. policy.

Moments of opportunity in Middle Eastern politics come much too infrequently to be lost. I can only hope that Bitburg has not opened so wide a rift that it would hinder a renewed effort in the region. It is certainly a factor that we should take into consideration and I would urge you to give it some thought.

And, in so doing, it is important to realize that incidents like the President's visit to Bitburg, the visit of Louis Farrakan to our universities, the lectures of Ernest Dube—equating Zionism with racism—are the obstacles we must overcome, the challenges we must face together, Jew and non-Jew, in the struggle for world peace and understanding.

The ADL has been essential in educating America's leaders and our fellow citizens to our Nation's vital stake in Israel as a democratic ally in the Middle East. The ADL has been at the forefront of efforts to maintain close ties between the United States and Israel; to encourage continued U.S. military and economic support. To borrow from the recent words of Elie Wiesel: "We needed a strong Israel in 1948, and we need it now."

We can and we must continue to work together to achieve a just and secure peace in this world. As your Representative to Congress, I pledge my help. And I know we can count on the ADL, and people like Lionel Goldberg, to continue in this valiant struggle for freedom and human rights for all. Thank you.●

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CZECHOSLOVAK MORAVAN CLUB

HON. MATTHEW F. McHUGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, this year marks the 50th anniversary of the founding of one of the most unique organizations in our country, the Czechoslovak Moravan Club of Endicott, NY, in which members of three nationalities unite to celebrate together their Czech, Moravian, and Slovak heritage.

Through cultural, family, and civic programs the club preserves and promotes the rich cultural traditions of these nationalities. No less than four dance groups are part of the club's activities, providing opportunities for all age groups to learn and perform traditional dances. In addition to presenting dance programs in the upstate New York region near Binghamton, the club's dance groups have performed in neighboring States, Canada, and here in the Nation's Capital. The club's dance groups will also perform this August at the Statue of Liberty, for the restoration of which the club has made a substantial donation as part of its program of fund drives to support local charities and other worthwhile causes. The club also sponsors a singing group, embroidery groups, egg scratching classes, language classes, and numerous committees to promote preservation of family and holiday traditions.

On May 4, the club will sponsor an ecumenical service, procession, and dinner-dance in celebration of the club's 50th year, and I know my colleagues are pleased to join me today in saluting the Czechoslovak Moravan Club for being one of the most vital and public-spirited organizations in the country, and an excellent example of how ancient cultural and social traditions have flourished in America and enriched all our citizens.●

A TRIBUTE TO ST. PAUL'S CHURCH

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 50th anniversary of St. Paul's United Methodist Church in Redondo Beach, CA.

St. Paul's sprang to life in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Wade during the winter of 1934-35. While originally the group met as a Sunday school class, later under the direction of a selected neighborhood committee, a formal meeting with Dr. B.F.H. Stevens, the district superintendent of the Methodist Church was held. In April 1935, the Methodist Conference sent Rev. E.J. Bradner to organize the Shore Acres Community Church. The church became a reality on May 5, 1935, when 16 to 18 Methodists met in the "Old Bottle Cap" factory in the neighborhood.

In 1938, land was purchased on the corner of Nelson Avenue and Felton Lane under the leadership of a new pastor, Dr. Alexander C. Stevens. Through the spirited labors of church members and friends of the neighborhood, the church sanctuary was ready for use by Christmas Day 1938. The neighborhood knew it as the little-hill top church. In 1939, the name was changed to North Redondo Methodist Church.

Though times were tough, the spirit of the little church remained strong. The membership gradually increased in size to 620 members in the 1960's. A new sanctuary and education buildings were constructed, additional lots were purchased, and another name change, to St. Paul's Methodist Church, occurred.

Through the late 1960's and into the 1980's, radical changes occurred in the neighborhood, and membership diminished to 150 members in 1979. Since that time, the church has shown slow, but steady, growth.

A variety of community groups have found a home at St. Paul's. The Head Start Program, the South Bay Unitarian Fellowship, four AA Groups, and South Bay Center for Counseling. This served as the original home of Mothers Anonymous, later to be known as Parents Anonymous, Scout groups, parents groups, and many other of the community-oriented programs.

St. Paul's Church serves as an important part in many peoples' lives, and has contributed a great deal in many aspects to Redondo Beach and the South Bay area.

It is a pleasure to share St. Paul's accomplishments with my colleagues and I hope it enjoys many more years of continued success.●

IN SUPPORT OF HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 67

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am sure everyone in this Chamber is aware of the importance of families, and would eagerly support legislation to strengthen them. With House Concurrent Resolution 67, my colleagues and I have just such an opportunity.

This resolution expresses the sense of Congress that grandparents' visitation rights ought to be preserved. Although 49 States now recognize these rights, they are nonetheless endangered. Courts have been lax in enforcement, which leaves the grandparents at the mercy of their in-laws. Separation or divorce is rarely pleasant, and often can be quite hostile. A spouse that wants to cut all ties with his or her ex-partner can effectively prevent the grandparents from seeing their grandchildren.

Even if the courts are diligent, they have no jurisdiction beyond State boundaries. Once the grandchildren are moved from the State where the divorce or separation occurred, the pleas of the grandparents can legally be ignored. House Concurrent Resolution 67 asks that a model act be adopted, with interstate recognition and enforcement of State court orders.

The act would also set standards to determine whether it would be in the best interest of the child to grant visitation privileges. Interpretation of what consititutes this best interest now varies widely; with clear, uniform guidelines, all parties concerned will know their rights and obligations.

Mr. Speaker, I applaud this resolution, and look forward to the day when this model legislation is in force. The grandparents of this Nation deserve no less.●

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS FISCAL YEAR 1986

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to authorize appropriations for the Department of Justice. The bill is in concert with the overall thrust of the administration's budget request, with several notable exceptions.

I do not believe that Federal employees should be required to take the 5-percent pay cut that the administration has recommended. The bill contains no pay cuts for Federal employees.

The bill reflects my belief that the administration has not requested sufficient funds for certain functions of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and, therefore, we have added funding to strengthen these important services.

The administration has requested additional funding for the U.S. attorneys. This request is based on the assumption that the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 would require additional U.S. attorney positions. The Congressional Budget Office, in the Senate report on the Senate version of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act, stated that new crimes would not significantly increase Federal expenditures. Therefore, the bill reflects a freeze for the U.S. attorneys at the 1985 service level.

Once again, the administration is seeking to eliminate the U.S. trustees in bankruptcy. The Congress has stated quite clearly and repeatedly that we believe the elimination of this program would have a deleterious effect on both the administration of justice and the bankruptcy system. In fact, just last July the Congress extended this important program in Public Law 98-353. Funding for the trustees is included in this bill.

The administration's request for the Drug Enforcement Administration does not provide sufficient resources for the Foreign Cooperation Investigation Program, for State and local assistance programs, and for other crucially needed funding in order to maintain its position in leading the Nation's fight against illegal drug trafficking.

This bill, I believe, takes into account the urgent need to have our Federal law enforcement agency properly equipped to handle the important mission which we have given them.●

COMMISSION ON WAGE DISCRIMINATION IN THE LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to establish a Commission on Employment Discrimination in the legislative branch charged with the responsibility of identifying and making recommendations for the elimination of wage discrimination in the legislative branch.

The problem of sex-based wage discrimination is not new. One hundred and thirty years ago, in 1855, noted feminist and suffragist Lucy Stone, observed:

> The floor merchant, the house builder, and the postman charge us no less on account of our sex; but when we endeavor to earn money to pay all of these, then indeed we find the difference.

Unfortunately, the wage gap between men and women has remained virtually constant in recent years despite the passage of the Equal Pay Act of 1963, making it illegal to pay women less than men for doing the same work, and title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which outlawed discrimination in employment and wages on the basis of sex, race, and national origin.

It is important to understand the relationship between these two laws, and sex-based wage discrimination. The Equal Pay Act guarantees women equal pay for equal work. However, the Equal Pay Act cannot begin to reach the wage discrimination that most women experience for a very simple reason. By and large, women do not work in the same jobs as men. As they did a century ago, most women remain segregated into a small number of low-paying, deadend jobs.

The fact is that 80 percent of all working women work in just 25 job classifications—jobs that are among the lowest paid in our society. And the pay they receive appears to have far less to do with the work they do than with the fact that they are women. Only title VII's broader prohibition of discrimination in employment and wages can reach these women.

In 1981, the Supreme Court made clear that the legal guarantees in title VII are broader than those in the Equal Pay Act, and indeed, extend to cases where the work being done by men and women is not substantially equal. The Court stated that limiting wage discrimination claims to equal pay for identical jobs would mean:

> That a woman who is discriminatorily underpaid could obtain no relief—no matter how egregious the discrimination might be—unless her employer also employed a man in an equal job in the same establishment, at a higher rate of pay.

The concept of pay equity recognizes simply that discrimination exists not only when people are paid differently for doing the same work but when they are paid differently by their employer for work that requires similar skill, effort, and responsibility. This form of wage discrimination is illegal under title VII of the Civil Rights Act, and it is this type of discrimination I am attempting to address in the legislation I am introducing today.

The U.S. Congress has shown great skill over the past 20 years in passing laws barring discrimination. Unfortunately, the Congress has shown even greater skill in avoiding these same laws. The purpose of my legislation is twofold: One, to identify the existence of discriminatory wage-setting and personnel policies and practices within the legislative branch as a whole, and the Library of Congress specifically, and two, to develop a comprehensive plan for eliminating these inequities.

My legislation would establish a 13-member, bipartisan, Commission comprised of Members of Congress, and labor and management representatives from the Library of Congress. The Commission will one hire an independent consultant to conduct a pilot study of compensation paid within and between job classifications within the Library of Congress, and analyze relevant personnel policies and practices; two, make specific recommendations for ensuring compliance with title VII and the policy objectives of the resolution; and three, establish a comprehensive plan for implementing pay equity throughout the legislative branch.

I want to clarify several points about the scope of my legislation. The intention of my legislation is to address discriminatory wage setting practices and related personnel policies and practices within the legislative branch as a whole. I believe it is important, however, to begin this effort with a well-constructed pilot study in one of our agencies—in this case, the Library of Congress—that can later be extended to other parts of the legislative branch.

Following completion of the Library of Congress study, the Commission is charged with the responsibility of developing a comprehensive plan for ensuring pay equity within the legislative branch. I would expect that this plan would include a consideration of the feasibility of extending the model created by the pilot study to other legislative branch agencies. I would also expect the Commission to consider the question of congressional staff. The Commission would have 18 months to complete its work.

The concept of my legislation is scarcely an original one. During hearings on this bill last year, Nina Rothchild, commissioner of the Minnesota Department of Employee Relations, testified that 17 States had changed their fair employment practices laws to include the standard that men and women should be paid equally for work requiring comparable skill, effort, and responsibility. Twenty-five States had either completed or are in the process of completing, studies of the type proposed in my legislation. And, five States had actually appropriated funds to eliminate the pay inequities that had been identified. At the present time, over 100 State and local governments have undertaken pay equity initiatives, and the successful outcomes have been our best lobbying tool.

For example, in 1979, a State government job evaluation study performed in Minnesota found that jobs held predominantly by woman were underpaid. In March 1982, a 4-year plan was enacted to rectify this problem at an estimated cost of 1 percent of the yearly payroll. In 1980, a job evaluation study performed in Colorado Springs revealed a wage disparity between female-dominated clerical jobs and male-dominated maintenance jobs which both received the same numerical rating. The city council adopted a 4-year plan to correct the wage differential at a project cost of $1.7 million which is 2.6 percent of the yearly payroll. The conservative Republican mayor of Colorado Springs, Robert Issac, summarized their new pay equity policy by saying:

> We did something fair and just, and in return we got ourselves great employee morale, lower turnover and higher productivity. Isn't that what the private sector's always looking for?

We have made freedom from discrimination in employment the law of the land, and I believe it is the responsibility of this Congress to ensure that its own employees receive the compensation that is rightfully theirs. I encourage my colleagues to join me in this effort by cosponsoring my legislation to create a Commission on Employment Discrimination in the legislative branch.●

TARIFF CLASSIFICATION OF CITRUS PRODUCTS

HON. ANDY IRELAND

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, today, Congressman MACKAY and I, along with other members of the Florida delegation, are introducing legislation to close an existing tariff classification loophole for reconstituted grapefruit juice.

During the 98th Congress we adopted our proposal to close the classification loophole for orange juice, but made no provision for the same situation confronting U.S. growers and processors of grapefruit and grapefruit juice. Under the existing Tariff Schedules, concentrated grapefruit juice is dutiable at 35 cents per gallon. If not concentrated, the product is dutiable at 20 cents per gallon.

Reconstituted grapefruit juice is made from the concentrate by adding sufficient water to reduce it to the equivalent of natural juice obtained from domestic grapefruit. The 15-cents-per-gallon difference in the rate of duty for concentrated grapefruit juice and ready-to-drink-juice reconstituted from the concentrate represents a 43 percent duty savings.

This potential gain provides foreign suppliers a strong incentive to reconstitute foreign concentrated grapefruit juice before it is cleared through U.S. Customs to avoid the duty originally intended for concentrated grapefruit juice and the reconstituted juice from which it is made.

Obviously, this tariff loophole places any U.S. processor making reconstituted juice from domestic concentrate, as well as U.S. growers supplying domestic grapefruit for either fresh use or for the production of fresh or concentrated juice, at a serious disadvantage.

Currently, the United States is the largest producer of grapefruit in the world. Brazil, Japan, Spain, Italy, and Mexico rank behind the United States, but we know production is increasing, particularly in Mexico. Citrus processing plants can produce either orange juice or grapefruit juice. Therefore, passage of the legislation to close the loophole for orange juice, without an accommodating change in the Customs treatment for grapefruit juice, could cause a shift to the importation of the latter product.

Another factor is that for tariff purposes, grapefruit juice is not specifically delineated in our tariff schedule, so we have no information on the actual imports of grapefruit juice. Our bill would provide for his vital information.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the merits of this bill are clear and ask that my colleagues give it their full support.●

TRIBUTE TO THE MERIT FASTENERS CORP.

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a company in my district, the Merit Fasteners Corp. of Bay Shore, NY. Last month, the General Electric Co. selected Merit as the "Vendor of the Month."

The provision of fast, high quality service is a valuable commodity. Throughout the history of this Nation, these characteristics have helped our country grow and have held it together during difficult times. In producing fasteners for General Electric, Merit embodies these qualities that have bonded our Nation together literally and figuratively. At a time when the military procurement industry has come under strong fire, I find it particularly heartening to learn of the distinguished commitment to quality represented by Merit.

I commend the employees of Merit for their outstanding contribution and hope that others in the industry will take note of their dedication to high quality service.●

MS. HALL SHOULD RESIGN HER POSITION OF PUBLIC TRUST

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, a new racist insult under the guise of scholarship now assaults all Americans. Another Reagan appointee has attempted to recreate our world according to the popular ideology of the intellectually inane and inept. I am speaking, of course, about Marianne Mele Hall, the new chairperson of the Copyright Royalty Tribunal who also served on the team which authored the new book, "Foundation of Sand." The authors are right about at least one thing, the book is built on the foundations of sand, that is, on unsound scholarship and intellectually repugnant ideas. It is part of a new "blame the victim movement" now sweeping the country.

Regretfully for 1985, this book is filled with the filth of stereotypes and racist fantasies about black Americans. Among other things, the book claims that the education of black youth can be advanced solely using black males as teachers and retired super athletes as principals. Obviously, the authors never heard of Anna Cooper or Mary McCleod Bethune or Marva Collins, black women educators of the first rank.

It is ironic that at a time when the President of the United States is paying homage to Nazi war dead that his appointee is being exposed for her involvement in circulating new assertions of black inferiority. Both events, the former perhaps inadvertent but the latter surely of malicious intent, reflect the unfortunate fact that public leaders are understood not only based on their words but are also judged on the basis of their actions.

I suspect that Ms. Hall did not understand that this work's ideas are racist at worst and insensitive at best. Her participation in a study of this poor quality raises serious issues regarding Ms. Hall's competence and judgment. Her involvement in this mean-spirited exception casts a pall over her capabilities. Now, given her conflicting statements regarding her participation in this awful book, either as an editor or as a coauthor, an issue of honesty also emerges. Ms. Hall informed the Senate that she was a coauthor but now asserts that she was an editor. Her associates say that she shaped the contents while she maintains that she only placed commas. I'm convinced that someone is misrepresenting the facts. It is possible that Ms. Hall perjured herself before the Senate.

The President did not heed our advice about Bitburg. Nonetheless we urge him to act swiftly on this domestic issue for the Nation's moral benefit. Public officials must represent the public's interest, not racist ideology. No public leaders, neither the President nor the Senators who confirmed Ms. Hall, can afford to be associated with a person who represents such vile and demeaning views.

For the sake of her country, Ms. Hall should resign her position of public trust. For the sake of her superior, the President, she should spare him much confusion and conflict by quietly returning to the private sector.

Our Government does not tell people what to say or what to think. That's the advantage of a free, open democratic society. But the kind of thinking which Ms. Hall represents is what creates an ideological climate for concentration camps and genocide. We cannot sanction racism by permitting its adherents to remain on the public payroll. The public does not deserve them nor should it be forced to pay for them.

It is my hope that the President will see fit to release Ms. Hall and keep our country moving closer toward "one nation, with liberty and justice for all."●

EQUALIZING UNITED STATES-CANADIAN TRADE

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution designed to heighten Congress' awareness of a critical issue: Our trade relationship with Canada. My resolution urges the President to step up his efforts to equalize that relationship, now an egregiously lopsided one that is detrimental to many American industries.

On March 17 and 18, President Reagan met with Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulroney. Trade between our two nations was one of the primary topics of the Quebec summit, and the discussions between these two leaders resulted in a joint declaration of their commitment to resolve our trade differences.

I commend this demonstration of concern by President Reagan and Prime Minister Mulroney. Nevertheless, I continue to be concerned over the need for further progress in resolving our trade disputes with Canada.

Many areas of the United States are currently suffering from trade policies enacted by Canadian Federal and Provincial governments that give Canadian products an unfair competitive advantage. In my home State of Maine, Canadian potatoes grown by subsidized farmers are being dumped on our side of the border; imports of subsidized Canadian fish are the biggest obstacles to the growth and competitiveness of the Maine fishing industry; and Canadian lumber, also heavily subsidized, threatens the future of many of our lumber firms.

Problems such as these are not confined to New England. New York's vegetable growers are being undercut by imports of fresh vegetables from Canada. Lumber manufacturers in the Northwest and other regions share the problems of their colleagues in Maine. Midwest pork producers have watched their access to domestic markets deteriorate because of significant increases in imports from subsidized Canadian pork producers.

Concern over our trade relationship with Canada is nationwide. The resolution I am introducing is the instrument by which this concern can be focused.

This resolution reaches across State boundaries and industry lines to bring those affected by Canadian trade issues together to express a single concern: We must resolve our trade differences with Canada, particularly those differences that involve Canada giving its industries an edge through unfair trade practices.

I urge my colleagues to join in supporting this resolution.●

THE VALUE OF THE VOICE OF AMERICA

HON. RAYMOND J. McGRATH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, today we are voting on authorizations for the Department of State, USIA, and the Voice of America. I rise today to express my personal interest in the vital modernization program currently underway at the Voice of America.

The need to strengthen VOA's radio signal overseas is unquestionable. VOA is the primary medium through which the United States communicates its policies, values, and national aspirations to the people of the world while seeking their understanding and support. While this House has spent considerable time in the past few weeks debating our role in the defense of freedom abroad, the Voice of America has served as a beacon of truth and reliability for those outside the Free World who recognize America's leadership role in the defense of democracy and freedom.

I would like to emphasize to my colleagues that there are nonmilitary aspects to our defense strategy and the greatest tool in that area is the truth. Far too many people learn about America from loudspeakers of hostile propaganda. Myths, misinformation, and disinformation are spread around the world by those who do not rule with consent of the governed and whose legitimacy is constantly threatened by the existence of a system governed with people's consent.

Mr. Speaker, this body has consistently joined together in opposition to the atrocities, the genocide, the repression, and the aggression of communism. We deplore the lesser violations of human rights. We profess to be advocates of the American Idea. Let us not forget that this advocacy must be carried out every minute of every day. I am comforted to know that for over 1,000 hours per week, the Voice of America is broadcasting the truth to over 120 million listeners in 42 languages.

The task of the VOA is a great one. I therefore find it difficult to believe how we have let broadcast facilities of the Voice fall into such poor condition. The VOA signal is inaudible in large areas of the world. It is too weak to overcome Soviet jamming. Many VOA transmitters are over 30 years old and obsolete. VOA even operates one transmitter built in the 1930's for Hitler's propaganda apparatus which was confiscated after the war. VOA has six 500 kW superpower transmitters—actually aged combinations of aged 250 kWs—compared to 37 modern units used by the U.S.S.R.

The support of the President and the Congress has made way for the implementation of a modernization program at the VOA. However, this program requires the continued support of this body. As we work to curtail the Federal deficit let us not forget that this capital investment in the strengthening of one of our most important tools of defense is long overdue. The longer we postpone the granting of funds to the VOA modernization program, the longer it will be before a clear signal from the Voice can be heard by those struggling in closed societies for freedom and democracy and the American Idea.●

A TRIBUTE TO DEBBIE AMARO

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the U.S. Congress heard an important message. It did not come from a Cabinet secretary, a big-city mayor, or a military officer. The source of this wisdom was one we often overlook on Capitol Hill—a child in elementary school.

Debbie Amaro is a student at Public School 15, in the Lower East Side of Manhattan. This area is one of the poorest in New York City; in fact, it is one of the poorest of the country. Debbie lives with her mother in an abandoned tenement. You would think that she has enough problems of her own. Yet this 9-year old has spent the past few months raising money to help feed the starving children of Africa.

Her efforts were part of a larger fundraising drive in the New York City school system. Many of these students knew what it was like to go hungry. When they saw others in even greater need, they responded. They gave their nickels and quarters for the cause—but they didn't stop there. The children did everything from holding benefit concerts to selling Valentine cards. So far over $250,000 has been raised, and, with the assistance of Save the Children, seed and grain has already been shipped directly to feeding centers in Ethiopia.

Mr. Speaker, this story is familiar to anyone who watched ABC's "20/20" show on April 24. Since the program was aired, thousands of letters and phone calls have come in praising the schoolchildren, and their efforts. Many people sent checks, and asked how similar drives could be made in their home towns. It is quite fitting that we celebrate "Save the Children Week" at this time, when so many Americans are demonstrating their care and concern.

Save the Children, which has been a pioneer in creating self-help projects, has held annual hearings in Congress to focus attention on the special needs of youngsters throughout the world. I am delighted that Debbie, along with four of her classmates at P.S. 15, were able to participate this year. I salute the work they did, and hope that schoolchildren across the Nation will follow their example.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that Debbie Amaro's speech be reprinted, so that we can all see that one person can make a difference. Thank you.

My name is Debbie Amaro. I am 9 years old. I live in New York City. I want to tell you what the children of New York City did. We raise $250,000 for the people in Ethiopia. We at P.S. 15 started in November by collecting snack money. We made hearts in February for Valentines day. We haven't stopped raising money. We are going to make Mother's Day cards and we are going to sell them. The reason we did this is because we care. Children my age are starving to death and I can help. But I am just a kid. I can do just so much. But I can't do everything. We can use some help. I think you should help us kids.●

THE SKIES ARE NOT SAFE YET

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, in January I introduced House Joint Resolution 66 calling upon the Department of Transportation to investigate and identify the possible causes of the all too frequent midair collisions, near misses, and crashes. Three weeks later, on January 21, a flight went down after takeoff from Reno, NV killing 69 people aboard.

Last week the following was called to my attention. In 1984, 1,015 people died in airplane crashes. And already this year, 308 people have died in airplane accidents. This is 77 more deaths in the same time period in 1984. In addition to the accidents there has been an increase in the near misses or as they have been more accurately called, near hits. The number of these "near" disasters has increased by nine over the same time period of 1984. With summer vacations near and the increase of air travel that goes hand in hand, these statistics are cause for alarm.

Air traffic is regulated by the Federal Government. We in Congress have a responsibility to see that it is carried out in the safest possible manner. We are all too familiar with the outrageous number of accidents and deaths it takes to have a stop sign put up at a dangerous intersection. It seems to me we've already reached such a statistic in air travel. What more are we waiting for?

A person on the way to a business meeting, a student on the way back to school, a family on vacation—these people should not have to fly in unsafe skies. The resolution I have introduced calls for an investigation into this problem. It's time some questions are asked and answered—known facts are frightening.●

ON THE PRESIDENT'S VISIT TO BITBURG CEMETERY

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, I strongly disagree with the President's decision to visit the German war cemetery at Bitburg. While I support his original intention to reaffirm the friendship between the German and American people, the choice of this cemetery, where 47 German SS soldiers are buried, was a mistake.

I made my position on this issue clear when I joined 252 of my colleagues in signing a letter to Chancellor Kohl, asking that he withdraw his invitation to President Reagan to visit Bitburg Cemetery. An appropriate site for the President to pay his respect to the German people could easily have been selected.

President Reagan's statements on this matter certainly did not calm the controversy and concern over the symbolic nature of this visit. However, when the President made his final decision on April 29 to visit the cemetery, I felt it totally inappropriate for the House to subsequently condemn the visit.

My vote against the resolution does not condone the President's decision or the mistakes which preceded it. Rather, I feel that now we must work to reverse the damage that has been done by this incident and not exacerbate this bad situation any further. The deep wounds of the horror inflicted upon the Jewish people have been reopened and damage has been done to our alliance with our German friends. We must now work to rectify these mistakes and deal appropriately both with history and our present-day allies. The time has come to get on with this task.●

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, due to a death in my family, I was absent from the House Chamber on Wednesday, May 1, 1985, and was unable to record my vote on a resolution and several procedural issues considered that day. Had I been present, my vote would have been cast as follows:

On rollcall No. 87 to approve the Journal, I would have voted "no".

On rollcall No. 88 to adjourn, I would have voted "yes".

On rollcall No. 89 to consider House Resolution 146, I would have voted "no".

On rollcall No. 90 to recommit House Resolution 146 to the House Committee on Administration, I would have voted "yes".

On rollcall No. 91 to agree to House Resolution 146, I would have voted "no".

On rollcall No. 92 to adjourn, I would have voted "yes".

I thank the Speaker for this opportunity to clarify my position on these matters.●

A TRIBUTE TO MICHAEL J. MULIDOR, JR.

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to take this opportunity to recognize an outstanding constituent. In recognition of his 33 years of service to this Riverbank School District, Michael J. Mulidor, Jr., deserves our heartiest congratulations for a job well done.

Mr. Mulidor started in 1952 as a teacher of music, English, communications, and mathematics at Cardozo School in the Riverbank School District. After 8 years as a teacher, he moved up to special supervisor for the school district. He then became vice principal and later principal of Cardozo High School. He held other positions with the Riverbank School District until 1984, when he was given the position of assistant superintendent of the school district. Through hard work and dedication, Mr. Mulidor achieved success.

Mr. Mulidor has also devoted a considerable amount of time to a variety of civic activities. He is a member of Lions International. He also formed the Little League of Riverbank, Band Parents of Riverbank, was a Boy Scout director, adviser to the Honor Society, integrated and implemented California Junior Scholastic Federation, and coached baseball, basketball, and football.

I hope that you will join with me in congratulating Mr. Mulidor on his retirement from the Riverbank School District. His special relationship and dedication to the furthering of young minds is an inspiration to us all. Thank you, Mr. Mulidor, for all of your efforts on behalf of the Riverbank School District.●

KILDEE HONORS EXCHANGE OF STUDENTS BETWEEN STE. MAUR, FRANCE AND GRAND BLANC, MI

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to take a moment to recognize and honor the children of Ste. Maur, France, who are visiting the United States as part of an exchange program with students from Grand Blanc, MI, a city in my congressional district.

In March 1985, 20 4th and 5th graders from Grand Blanc visited Ste. Maur, France for 3 weeks. While there they were able to get a deeper understanding of French culture, people, and customs. They stayed with host families visiting different areas of the city of Ste. Maur.

On May 1, 1985, French students from Ste. Maur began a 3-week visit to Grand Blanc. They will stay with host families, fromn Grand Blanc, allowing them a glimpse of our American culture, and share in many other educational and social experiences.

This exchange of our two cultures is sure to bring a better understanding between our people. I am most pleased to have the students from Ste. Maur with us. I know the students of Grand Blanc and the students of Ste. Maur are leaders of our future. The exchange which culminates with their visit to the United States is an important first step in their learning to live together with all the peoples of the world. I know the people of our two communities and of our two great nations will continue to grow in friendship and understanding.●

THE 300TH ANNIVERSARY OF DANBURY, CT

HON. JOHN G. ROWLAND

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, Danbury, CT, is celebrating the 300th anniversary of its founding this year. On such an important occasion, I wanted to talk about the rich and long history of this city, as well as the quality of life there today.

In 1684, the first settlements in Danbury were made by pioneers looking for trapping opportunities. Soon, the area became prosperous in trapping and developed a strong trading center. After American independence was achieved, however, manufacturing became the dominant economic entity. By the early years of the 19th century, mechanized hatmaking was begun in the city and eventually emerged as the strongest industry in the city. Danbury is still well known for its hat production.

On a historical note, it should be emphasized that Danbury was known for its strategic location during the Revolutionary War. On April 24, 1777, Gen. William Tryon, the English commander in New York, attacked Danbury because war materials were stored there. Shortly thereafter, during the winter of 1778–79, Gen. Israel Putnam of the Continental Army stationed his troops in Danbury.

Today, the city is experiencing tremendous growth. A nearly 25-percent population gain was registered between 1970 and 1980, which represents more than 40 percent of Connecticut's total growth during the period. What accounts for Danbury's fabulous growth?

One factor that contributes to the growth is the way the city handles expansion. While welcoming growth, the city strives to plan it in a controlled fashion. For instance, the new shopping mall near the Danbury Airport was cleared for construction only after road improvements were approved.

A second asset to the community is the educational and cultural presence. Western Connecticut State University offers extensive undergraduate, graduate, and adult programs, in addition to many cultural activities.

Recreation in Danbury is also varied and within easy reach for all city residents. An abundance of hills, woods, lakes, streams, and ponds account for the great scenic beauty of the area. The many recreation facilities include beaches, tennis courts, ballfields, ice-skating ponds, hiking trails, golf courses, and State parks.

Finally, today's economy is particularly strong. Unlike many New England mill towns, Danbury was able to avoid the disastrous time of the late 1940's and the 1950's. It accomplished this feat by diversifying its economy. Today, manufacturing represents just 37 percent of the city's economy. To the city's credit, the economy continues to grow at a much faster rate than Connecticut's growth.

As Danbury celebrates its tricentennial, its residents can be very proud of the city's long and rich history and the various facets of contemporary Danbury which contribute to the high quality of life there.●

AMEND THE LEGAL SERVICES ACT

HON. LARRY COMBEST

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 2, 1985

● Mr. COMBEST. Mr. Speaker, I come before this distinguished body today to introduce legislation amending the Legal Services Act.

It is my belief that some of the legal services' federally funded offices have greatly overstepped original congressional intent in establishing this legal service for the poor. A particular situation in a city in my district has prompted me to examine closely the Legal Services Act, and I find it to be severely deficient in providing for corrective measures.

Under current law, the Legal Services Corporation cannot in any way alter the terms of any grant issued unless the recipient goes through a hearing before an independent hearing examiner. Due to loopholes in the Legal Services Act, these hearings sometimes last 2 to 4 years. Meanwhile, the entity in violation continues to receive Federal funding for its improper activities.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support my amendment of the Legal Services Act that would place specific time constraints on the hearing process. We must make every effort to ensure that our constituents' tax money is being used efficiently, fairly, and legally.●

SENATE—Friday, May 3, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, April 15, 1985)

The Senate met at 8:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable PAUL S. TRIBLE, JR., a Senator from the State of Virginia.

Mr. TRIBLE. The prayer this morning will be offered by the Reverend William Scully, a Franciscan priest, who is special assistant to Senator WILLIAM ROTH.

PRAYER

The Reverend William Scully, O.F.M., special assistant to Senator WILLIAM ROTH, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Heavenly Father, we beseech Your guidance today upon the Members of the Senate as they exercise their awesome responsibilities as guardians of the public trust and trustees of the American dream.

As the Members of this august body continue their deliberations on the budget, we ask You to grant them wisdom to distinguish between the substantive and the superficial, between the Nation's good and their own individual concerns. Strengthen and protect them this day against the relentless and seductive pressures from without. Infuse them with energy to fulfill their appointed tasks. Help them to resolve their differences this day without rancor and bitterness. Teach them to respect, appreciate and honor diversity of thought and opinions.

May they always treasure virtue and integrity. And, in their deliberations and actions, may they never sacrifice principles for expediency.

We ask this through Christ our Lord. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, May 3, 1985.

To the Senate:

Under the provision of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable PAUL S. TRIBLE, JR., a Senator from the State of Virginia, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. TRIBLE thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting majority leader is recognized.

COMMENDING THE VISITING CHAPLAIN

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of our visiting Chaplain relating to continuing our efforts here not on the basis of win or lose. Eventually we will reach a result because, indeed, there is a great majority on both sides of the aisle who have a deep desire to see a $50 to $60 billion reduction in deficits in the first year with larger reductions in the second and third years.

There has been a common effort. There is no question about that. How we get there we will see unfold.

SCHEDULE

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the two leaders will have 10 minutes each under the standing order. We have a special order in favor of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE]. Then there will be routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 9 a.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

Following routine morning business, the Senate will resume consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the budget resolution. Pending is amendment No. 50, relating to Medicare and Medicaid.

Mr. President, rollcall votes could occur as early as 10:30 a.m. and can be expected throughout the session this day.

Mr. President, I see a smile on the face of the Senator from Wisconsin, who is a delightful friend and whom I met early in my time here. He served with my father. I have always admired his tenacity and his abilities.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time and yield to the Senator from Wisconsin for his special order.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MINORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the minority leader be reserved for his use later today.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I would like to thank my good friend, the assistant majority leader. He adds so much to this body. If you say comity or comedy, either way, he is one of the most delightful and humorous people.

You know, this could be a very deadly, dull place, if we did not have the kind of humor and stimulation that my good friend provides. I cannot thank him enough for his kind remarks.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

STAR WARS: THE TRILLION DOLLAR BOONDOGGLE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, one of the great ironies is that we face a huge deficit. We live in a time in which we probably have the most irresponsible fiscal policy in the history of our country and at the same time the President has proposed a program which will put all other spending programs to shame because of its enormous extravagance. It will not be coming down for 5 or 6 years reaching its big cost, but eventually the cost is going to be enormous.

Let me approach that this way:

Mr. President, what is wrong with the administration's proposed strategic defense initiative or star wars program? Secretary Weinberger and President Reagan argue that it would simply reduce the threat of Russia's massive intercontinental ballistic missile arsenal. That Russian arsenal is far larger than our land-based deterrent. It is deadly accurate. It could destroy most of our land-based, nuclear weapon retaliatory capability. With it the Soviets could knock out our nuclear carrying bombers that are on the ground. They could completely eliminate American submarine bases and all submarines in port. They could totally devastate our cities. They could destroy more than half of our population. Therefore—says the President—what is wrong with our building a defense against what is without question the greatest threat to our Nation and the American people in our history?

Is not such an obvious danger to our Nation the clearest and most urgent reason for spending whatever money the President says we require on national defense? Whether such a defense will cost hundreds of billions or even a trillion dollars or more, is not this the kind of challenge to our existence as a nation that we must pay any price to meet? After all, such a defensive system is not aimed at killing Russians or even attacking Russian military bases. It is aimed at saving American lives by destroying the nuclear warheads that would take millions of American lives. Indeed has not the President even offered to give the defensive technology once we have developed it to the Soviets so they can use it to save the lives of Russians? What is wrong with advancing a defense program that will make the terrible threat of intercontinental ballistic missiles obsolete? So what is the answer?

Mr. President, there is only one fundamental trouble with the administration's strategic defense initiative or star wars. It will not work. That is right, it will not work. There is not a shadow of a hint of a possibility that it could work. None. If the Congress should somehow become mesmerized into building this trillion dollar system, it will cause a great deal more damage than its immense cost. In a letter carried by the Wall Street Journal on January 2, 1985, six of the most respected and distinguished scientific experts in the country specify unanswerable reasons why this is so.

First they point out that SDI or star wars does not defend against or even try to defend against low altitude delivery systems. In other words bombers, cruise missiles or suitcase nuclear weapons would not be touched. The Soviet Union certainly would have to spend money to build new nuclear delivery systems. But they could and would shift to bomber and submarine carrying cruise missiles that hug the ground and fly under any intercepting net.

Now, Mr. President, I have raised this point over and over again with defenders of the star wars defense, and I have yet to receive any answer. Why can't the administration and other apologists of star wars like the Wall Street Journal respond? The answer is obvious. In fact star wars wouldn't work and couldn't work against this kind of underflying.

Second, the Soviets could simply exhaust the star wars defense by building more offensive missiles, and they could do it on the cheap. It is cheaper to build new offensive missiles than to shoot down old ones.

This is especially true because the Soviet Union, of course, has missiles which have great throw-weight and which now have only three or four or five warheads, in some cases even less, per missile. Of course, they could be further MIRV'd. That is one of the cheapest kinds of ways of adding to a warhead capability.

By spending less money, the Soviets could overwhelm any defensive system we built. Is there an answer to this? No. The next time you encounter a star wars advocate point out that the Russians could simply overwhelm it with more offensive missiles and watch him sputter.

Third, the Soviets can build countermeasures with hundreds of thousands of decoys and other penetration aids that could frustrate and use up any defensive system. They can harden the skin of the missiles so they can penetrate any net.

Fourth, to the extent the SDI or star wars was perceived by the Russians to be working—the prospect of a Soviet attack sharply increases. Here is why: If they did believe that, once in place, SDI would permit us to launch a preemptive strike and then to destroy the surviving Russians missiles, Soviet paranoia might persuade them to strike first, where and when and to the degree they wished.

Fifth, these expert scientific critics of star wars recognize an element with which each Member of the Senate as a practicing politician is very familiar. They call it "institutional momentum." As they put it:

> When a trillion dollars is waved at the U.S. aerospace industry, the project in question will rapidly acquire a life of its own—independent of the validity or its public justifications. With jobs, corporate profits, and civilian and military promotions at stake, a project of this magnitude, once started, becomes a juggernaut, the more difficult to stop the longer it rolls on.

Mr. President, the 99th Congress faces the most serious budget crisis in many years. Democrats as well as Republicans in this Congress recognize that we must cut spending. American taxpayers call for it. A decent sense of responsibility insists on it. We have to make some painful reductions in programs that obviously benefit small business, working men and women, farmers, and millions of Americans who need education, nutrition, and housing. Should this Congress at this time, facing a financial stringency likely to last for the rest of this century, begin to fund a star wars program that will probably cost over a trillion dollars before we finish it? Should we engage in this trillion-dollar boondoggle at a time when the Nation's outstanding scientists so convincingly argue that it will not work? Frankly, this Senator cannot conceive of a more irresponsible waste of the taxpayer's money.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter to which I referred, from the Wall Street Journal of January 2, 1985, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

'STAR WARS' SEEN AS UNWORKABLE AND DANGEROUS

Your editorial of Dec. 10 used a barrage of errors and distortions to attack our Star Wars analysis ("The Fallacy of Star Wars," New York: Vintage, 1984), carried out under the auspices of the Union of Concerned Scientists.

First, some corrections: Fast-burn boosters, which would be invulnerable to X-rays and particle beam weapons, were not first proposed by us, but by an aerospace contractor; that such boosters would require only a small penalty in payload has been confirmed in writing by the deputy chairman of the presidential panel on strategic defense.

Robert Jastrow's allegation that we made two dozen errors that "all tend to make . . . defense appear more costly and difficult" is undocumented as well as false. We granted Star Wars every benefit of the doubt allowed by the laws of physics: beam weapons that would move instantly from one missile to the next and never miss; no safety factors for malfunctions; lasers of a lethality for which not even a design concept exists; etc. No military system in history has ever attained the immaculate perfection we were willing to posit for Star Wars.

The very first version of our report did have two errors, which we corrected in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee within a month. They appeared neither in our Scientific American article nor in our book. Our errors were neither intentional nor infantile, as your editorial suggests.

Nor are they critical. The calculation of the number of satellite "battle stations" required is not simple. In particular, the one by "defense experts at Los Alamos" to which you allude is incorrect. But, as we emphasized from the first, the number of satellites is beside the point; as Edward Teller has noted "lasers in space won't fill the bill—they must be deployed in great numbers at terrible cost and could be destroyed in advance of an attack."

The other error, concerning particle beams, appeared only in the technical appendix of the preliminary version of our book; we consider it minor because in any case fast-burn boosters make particle beam weapons "impotent and obsolete."

Enough of trees; let us examine the forest: A nearly impermeable strategic defense system would indeed have the capability to "save lives" rather than to "avenge them," to replace strategic deterrence by defense. But such a system is not in the cards, as even the program's director, General James Abrahamson, readily admits. Anything short of an impermeable system tends to undermine, not improve, U.S. national security. Here are some of the reasons that we consider the Star Wars scheme unworkable and a grave danger to the United States:

Underflying: Star Wars does not defend against, or even address, low-altitude delivery systems—bombers and cruise missiles, and "suitcase" nuclear weapons. By themselves, they are able to destroy both nations;

Star Wars would accelerate their development.

Overwhelming: The number of strategic warheads in the Soviet arsenal (as in our own) is about 10,000. If even a few percent of these warheads exploded on U.S. territory it would represent an unparalleled human disaster and effective collapse of the United States as a functioning political entity. The Soviets could keep ahead of any American Star Wars system because it is cheaper to build new warheads than to shoot down old ones (and easier to shoot down orbiting defensive systems than incoming missiles).

Outfoxing: It is cheaper to build countermeasures than to build Star Wars. Some decades in the future when a (still highly premeable) U.S. Star Wars system might be deployed, the Soviets would have added tens or hundreds of thousands of decoys and other penetration aids to their arsenal. Their objective would be to fatally confuse the American Star Wars system, which can never be adequately tested except in a real nuclear war.

Cost: Former Secretaries of Defense Harold Brown and James Schlesinger, and senior Pentagon spokesmen of this Administration, have all estimated the full Star Wars cost as hundreds of billions to one trillion dollars.

Soviet preemption: Despite U.S. assurances, the Soviets perceive Star Wars as part of a U.S. first strike strategy, allowing us to launch a preemptive attack and then to destroy the remnant of any surviving Soviet retaliatory forces. In a time of severe crisis, this may tempt the Soviet Union to make a preemptive first strike against the United States.

Institutional momentum: When a trillion dollars is waived at the U.S. aerospace industry, the project in question will rapidly acquire a life of his own—independent of the validity of its public justifications. With jobs, corporate profits, and civilian and military promotions, at stake, a project of this magnitude, once started, becomes a juggernaut, the more difficult to stop the longer it rolls on.

We do not oppose defense in principle. We are in favor of carefully bounded research in this area, as in many others; we are also concerned that the line between research and early deployment of key Star Wars components not be blurred. Several of us have devoted considerable effort to research on missile defense. Some of us have advocated missile defense for individual missile silos. But we agree with Department of Defense experts who make it clear that cities cannot be so protected. Mr. Schlesinger has said "in our lifetime and that of our children, cities will be protected by forebearance of those on the other side, or through effective deterrence."

DR. MURIEL GARDINER

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, as a student, Dr. Muriel Gardiner, helped to save hundreds of people from the Nazis in occupied Austria.

Dr. Gardiner began her work in the underground when Nazis raided the medical school she was attending. Between 1934 and 1938 she helped supply passports and funds to Jews and other dissidents fleeing Austria.

After the Anschluss, foreign currency was required for travel outside Austria. Dr. Gardiner served as an important source of American dollars. She smuggled passports into Austria and even lent her passport to a friend who needed to escape.

As a medical student, she helped several Jewish medical students who went on to become physicians in the United States.

While Dr. Gardiner helped save numerous people from Nazi horrors, her adventures did not all have happy endings. Witness the case of Hans and Steffi Kunke. The Kunkes were young teachers who refused to leave without their friend, Ferdinand Tshuertsch. Before they could obtain a passport for Ferdinand, they were arrested. All three later died in a concentration camp.

Dr. Gardiner traveled the length and breadth of Europe in her efforts to obtain passports and money. She performed her dangerous underground work under the pressures of raising a young child and completing medical school examinations.

Dr. Gardiner is one of the real heros whose example should inspire us in the Senate to ratify the Genocide Convention. Ratification would serve as a fitting testament to this brave freedom fighter.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 9 a.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I indicate to my colleagues who may be in or on the way in that there is an amendment pending, the Packwood-Durenberger-Chafee-Heinz amendment on Medicare-Medicaid which represents a modification of that provision in the so-called White House-leadership package. It is my hope that we would have a vote on that, hopefully, by 10:30 or 11 o'clock. Then we hope to call up at least two or three additional amendments, unless the distinguished minority leader has amendments, and have votes on those yet today.

It would seem to me, in looking at the total picture that—though it may be hard to perceive—in my view we are making progress. It may not appear that way to the people who read the papers and watch television, but as I look at it, we are approaching what I believe could be a good conclusion. I am not certain when that conclusion will come, but I am confident that when it is all over, we will have, based on the first vote, a package that would reduce spending, without taxes, in the neighborhood of $300 billion over a 3-year period. It will not be easy, but as I have been looking at votes and visiting with Members on both sides, it is at least encouraging.

So I indicate to my colleagues that we hope to complete action today, at least from the standpoint of votes, by 2 or 3 o'clock.

DR. MILTON S. EISENHOWER: NATIVE KANSAN, 1899-1985

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is no surprise to say that the name Eisenhower is a very special one in my home State. The name is synonymous with the high ideals of this Nation and tells us much about a family from Abilene, KS, that contributed so much to America. It is therefore with sadness that we mark the passing yesterday afternoon of Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower. Although he spent most of his adult life in the Baltimore-Washington area, his roots were firmly planted in the rich commonsense soil of Kansas.

During his distinguished career as an educator, Dr. Eisenhower was a wellspring of wisdom for eight Presidents, including his brother, Ike. President Eisenhower, in fact, often referred to his youngest brother as "the bright one in our family," no small tribute from one of the giant figures in our history. Indeed, he was never intimidated by the long shadow of his famous brother and dedicated his life to an active pursuit of helping his fellow man.

Mr. President, Dr. Eisenhower was born in Abilene on September 15, 1899. He excelled in local schools and later enrolled as a journalism major in Kansas State University, where he would return in 1943 as its president. During his college years, he worked as a cub reporter for the Abilene Daily Reflector, where he earned funds to put himself through school. It was his experiences at our great institution of higher learning in Manhattan that launched him on a brilliant career in education, taking him to the top leadership positions at Pennsylvania State University and Johns Hopkins University.

Although his duties as a diplomat, administration official, educator, adviser, and presidential troubleshooter took him far from the heartlands, he never forgot his hometown. Dr. Eisenhower returned frequently to Kansas—almost always accompanying the President when Ike came home—and enjoyed visiting with the good people of Abilene.

Mr. President, we mourn the passing of this selfless, dedicated Kansan and extend our sympathies to his family and friends.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas requests that an obituary from today's Wichita Eagle-Beacon be reprinted in full following these remarks.

There being no objection, the obituary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wichita Eagle-Beacon, May 3, 1985]

MILTON EISENHOWER DIES OF CANCER AT 85

BALTIMORE.—Milton S. Eisenhower, 85, last surviving brother of President Dwight D. Eisenhower and a durable public figure himself who served eight presidents and headed three universities, died Thursday at Johns Hopkins Hospital. He had cancer.

Eisenhower was a native of Abilene and had lived for the past 28 years in Baltimore, where he served twice as president of The Johns Hopkins University.

He also was president of Kansas State College—now Kansas State University at Manhattan—and of Pennsylvania State University during periods of rapid growth at both institutions in the 1940s and 1950s.

In government he worked as a high-level official for Presidents Calvin Coolidge, Herbert Hoover and Franklin D. Roosevelt and was a close unpaid adviser to every president, including his brother, from Truman to Nixon.

He served on 12 presidential commissions, was the chairman of five, including the controversial Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Crime after the urban riots of the 1960s, and received the highest civilian decoration from the presidents of seven foreign countries for his work in international cooperation.

He wrote two books, "The Wine Is Bitter" in 1963, a best seller on U.S.-Latin American relations, and "The President Is Calling" in 1974, a hard look at the job of being president of the United States.

During a life that took him from the plains of his native Kansas to the seats of world power, Eisenhower received 37 honorary degrees from 32 American universities and five foreign universities and sat on the boards of 13 corporations, including insurance companies and financial institutions from California to England.

James McCain, who followed Eisenhower as Kansas State president in 1950, recalled the former Kansan as "that rare combination of a man equally at home in public affairs and in higher education."

On his 85th birthday Sept. 15, his friends at Kansas State sent him a card signed by 2,000 people and Gov. John Carlin proclaimed the day "Milton Eisenhower Day" in Kansas.

Former WSU President Emory Lindquist was president of Bethany College in the 1940s when he served with Eisenhower on the Kansas Committee on the Selection of Rhodes Scholars.

"A man of great personal resources, I was impressed with his wide range of knowledge," Lindquist said.

Wichitan Marge Setter, a journalism school student during Eisenhower's tenure at K-State, visited him last year with Harry Marsh, the head of the journalism school. They convinced Eisenhower to tape record a greeting for the department's 75th anniversary.

"He was absolutely marvelous to visit," she said. "We had a wonderful afternoon with him. I enjoyed it partly because we reminisced about when he was at K-State.

"The thing he did (at the university) was to emphasize arts and sciences and what you call comprehensive courses so that when you were studying Euclid inventing geometry you heard what's going on in the world at the same time."

Asked what she remembered best about him, Setter said, "He was a brilliant man, really. It was his intellect. At any given moment to serve a point, he would quote the most apropos thing that related to the subject. He could pull a quote out of the air like that."

Born in Abilene on Sept. 15, 1899, Milton Eisenhower was the last of seven children, all sons, of David and Ida Eisenhower. Milton's older and more famous brother, Dwight, was born in 1890.

At the age of 4, Milton was struck with scarlet fever, which left him with permanently weak eyes. Scrawny compared with his athletic brothers, he pursued books and became a scholar.

He worked his way through what was then called Kansas State College in Manhattan, playing a dance-band piano and writing free-lance articles for Kansas newspapers.

Plagued by illness and financial problems, he eventually graduated in 1924. Shortly thereafter, he achieved exceptionally high scores on a federal civil-service examination and was posted to Scotland as vice consul in Edinburgh.

Two years later he was back in the United States, serving as chief assistant to President Coolidge's Secretary of Agriculture, William Jardine, who had been president of Kansas State College when Milton Eisenhower studied there. It was the first of many high positions he would hold in the next four decades.

Later he served, among other posts, as Roosevelt's personal representative in planning the first wartime Quebec Conference with British Prime Minister Winston Churchill.

Midway through the war, Eisenhower left government to serve successively as president of Kansas State, Pennsylvania State University and Johns Hopkins, spanning almost three decades from 1943 to 1972.

In the academic phase of his life, Eisenhower (all of his doctorates were honorary) presided over both expansion and liberalization of the three schools he headed.

While president of Kansas State from 1943 to 1950, the physical plant was increased 50 percent, and faculty salaries were increased 75 percent.

Eisenhower served as president of Johns Hopkins from 1956 to 1967, and again from 1971 to 1972, the only person to hold the position twice.

He retired from Hopkins in 1967 but was called back in 1971 to help trim deficits run up during the administration of his successor, Lincoln Gordon.

Eisenhower's wife, Helen Eakin, died in 1954. They had two children, Ruth Eisenhower Snider, who died in 1954, and Milton S. Jr.

He is survived by his son, who lives in Scarsdale, N.Y., and four grandchildren.

MILTON S. EISENHOWER

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, Milton Eisenhower was endowed with the qualities of the ideal American: integrity, independence, industry, and intelligence. In a career of public service that began in the administration of Calvin Coolidge, he was generous in giving all his talent for the good of his country.

I feel both privileged and fortunate to have been able to draw on his experience and knowledge at various critical times during the last two decades. Not only his specific advice, but also his disciplined method of attacking problems has made a profound impression on me. I shall always be grateful to him.

The children and siblings of those who become global figures sometimes have difficulty in establishing their own identity despite considerable talent of their own. This was never true of Milton Eisenhower even when Dwight Eisenhower was President of the United States. Milton Eisenhower was always a figure in his own right, working hard to sustain his opinions and judgments and to advocate the causes he supported. The fact that those causes were usually right gave him an unusual dimension as a citizen and as a human being.

I count it among the blessings of my life that fate has allowed me the honor and pleasure of having Milton Eisenhower as a friend. This remarkable man has set a standard of public service that is matchless. He was an example to, and an influence on, generations of Americans who know him only for the breadth of his interests and achievements.

For his friends, he has been a constant source of wisdom, wit, and warmth. He possessed in abundance that greatest of all God's gifts, "an understanding heart."

It is difficult to capture a man of Milton Eisenhower's stature and spirit in words.

Mrs. Mathias, who also enjoyed Milton Eisenhower's friendship, shares my sorrow at his death. We join in expressing our sympathy to Milton Eisenhower, Jr., and to the Eisenhower family.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial and an obituary from today's Baltimore Sun be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the items were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, May 3, 1985]

MILTON S. EISENHOWER

In 1951, a group of influential Republicans approached Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower and asked him to seek the Republican nomination for president. "You don't want me," the general answered. "You want my brother Milton."

That story gained currency four years later, when Ike's supporters expected him to retire after one term in favor of his youngest brother—"the bright one in the family," the president called him. But in 1956, Dwight D. Eisenhower won a second term and his brother, Milton, accepted the presidency of the Johns Hopkins University.

So awe-inspiring was Milton S. Eisenhower's leadership of the Hopkins for 11 years (and a second term of ten months) and so substantial were his contributions to Baltimore ending in his death yesterday at 85, that it tended to overshadow his equally important role on the national scene.

He served eight presidents. He was the close confidant, adviser and sounding board for his brother, both before and during his years at the Johns Hopkins. He was an expert on farming, land use, opinion-making, Latin America, domestic violence, the organization of government and the office of the presidency.

Milton Eisenhower presided over Johns Hopkins University at a time of expansion that coincided with rising quality and fiscal prudence. He was a builder, fund-raiser, grantsman and pipeline to government. Above all, though, he was an educator and never for one second forgot it.

He was a Baltimore patriot and staunch Orioles fan. In politics, he remained a moderate Republican, defining himself as "a conservative on financial matters and a liberal on matters pertaining to human rights."

His strength at the university was more than just his connections in Washington, though those brought the likes of his brother and Prime Minister Harold Macmillan to the Homewood campus simultaneously, and lesser eminences by the score. His very special strength was his trusting communications with students, faculty, administration, trustees, alumni and community, rather than with some one or two of those groups. That was how he doubled the Hopkins endowment, tripled income, eliminated deficits, enlarged the campus, increased the production of doctorates and raised the quality of undergraduate education.

For three decades, Milton Eisenhower was a consummate Baltimorean. He was one of the great university presidents anywhere. As such he will be remembered here, though that is but one facet of his contributions to his country.

MILTON EISENHOWER, ADVISER TO EIGHT PRESIDENTS, DIES

(By Mike Bowler)

Milton Stover Eisenhower, educator, author and adviser to eight presidents, among them his brother, Dwight, died yesterday afternoon at Johns Hopkins Hospital.

Funeral services for the 85-year-old former president of the Johns Hopkins University are scheduled tomorrow at 10 a.m. at the Church of the Redeemer, 5603 North Charles street.

Dr. Eisenhower, who lived in the 3900 block of North Charles street, had battled illness for several years and had been hospitalized several times in recent months with cancer.

Born in Abilene, Kan., the last of six brothers, Dr. Eisenhower left an indelible mark as public servant and educator. He was an adviser to presidents from Calvin Coolidge to Richard M. Nixon and a troubleshooter in labor disputes, foreign crises and other matters, foreign and domestic.

He was instrumental in shaping U.S. policy in Latin America in the 1950s and later helped lay the foundation for the Alliance for Progress, the vast Latin American economic and social development program of the Kennedy administration.

As the only man to lead the Johns Hopkins University twice, he tripled income and doubled endowment, raising faculty salaries to fourth-highest in the nation. He was known as a thoughtful, reasoned administrator who did not interfere in faculty affairs, and he became an expert of the U.S. presidency and the nomination process for presidential candidates.

In an active retirement, Dr. Eisenhower raised money to fight violence in America, led a drive for a six-year U.S. presidential term and continued a love affair with the Baltimore Orioles. At a Memorial Stadium party on his 75th birthday, the Orioles presented Dr. Eisenhower with a $1-a-year "contract" as a right-handed reliever and asked him to throw out the first ball.

He wrote two books, including "The President Is Calling" in 1974. The book was a close-range assessment of the eight presidents he had come to know intimately and an evaluation of the Constitution and laws and traditions affecting the presidency.

A man of medium height, clear blue eyes, trim build, erect carriage and crisp, direct but amiable manner, he kept up an enormous range of activities in his professional and private life.

Close friends and admirers mourned the loss of Dr. Eisenhower. "He was a man of great good sense and great good humor who did great good in the world," said Stephen E. Ambrose, historian at the University of New Orleans and biographer of both Milton and Dwight D. Eisenhower. "He was one of the most intelligent men I ever met, and the kindest."

George S. Wills, a Baltimore public relations man who had known Dr. Eisenhower for 30 years, said, "One of his greatest contributions was providing a wonderful example of how to grow old. He displayed courage and grace under very difficult circumstances, particularly the last three years."

Steven Muller, president of Johns Hopkins, had served as provost under Dr. Eisenhower and then had succeeded him as head of the university. "Working with him and for him was one of the really great experiences in my life," Dr. Muller said. "He was a totally admirable person. He had a lively, very practical mind. He possessed a wealth of information. . . . There wasn't a mean bone in his body.

"Whenever I felt I needed to talk, he was always ready to tell me what he thought, what he knew," said Dr. Muller. "Long before I came to this university, he had restored it to solvency, and he knew everything about it. But he never interfered, never tried to impose his will."

Maryland Senator Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., one of a close group of friends who met regularly with Dr. Eisenhower to discuss world affairs, said, "He represented the epitome of citizenship. He knew a citizen's duty: be informed, be involved. As a result, his advice was always current and important."

Senator Paul S. Sarbanes of Maryland said Dr. Eisenhower's counsel "was especially sought by those of us who valued his wisdom."

Born in Abilene September 15, 1899, Milton Eisenhower was the youngest of six brothers: Arthur, banker in Kansas City, Mo.; Edgar, corporation lawyer in Tacoma, Wash.; Dwight, commander of Allied Forces in World War II and President from 1952 to 1960; Roy, pharmacist in Junction City, Kan., and Earl, electrical engineer and newspaper owner.

Majoring in journalism at Kansas State Agricultural College (now Kansas State University of Agriculture and Applied Science), he interrupted his studies for two years to earn expenses as city editor of the Abilene Daily Reflector. After having received his bachelor of science degree from the college, he joined its faculty as assistant professor of journalism, leaving in 1924 when appointed to the diplomatic service.

The next two years were spent as vice consul in Edinburgh, Scotland, and as a part-time graduate student at the University of Edinburgh.

Then Dr. Eisenhower moved from diplomacy to the Department of Agriculture, where he held a number of posts during the next 16 years, starting as assistant to the secretary and becoming director of information and coordinator of the land-use program.

The outbreak of World War II brought new responsibilities.

Appointed director of the War Relocation Authority by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Dr. Eisenhower supervised the Japanese evacuation camps in California but later criticized the authority for its work. "He ran [the camps] with as much fairness as was humanly possible," said Dr. Ambrose, his biographer.

Dr. Eisenhower's specialty on the international scene was Latin America, but he had missions in other nations during World War II, and he played a prominent role in the beginnings of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

In June, 1942, President Roosevelt named him associate director of war information, and in December, after the Allied invasion of North Africa led by his brother, he was sent to Algeria and Morocco. His mission was to resolve problems of refugee relief and relocation and to establish an organization for psychological warfare in Europe.

Next he began a new career, and for a quarter-century he was to serve three universities as president, beginning with Kansas State, in 1943. Seven years later he assumed the top position at Pennsylvania State University, and in 1956 he arrived in Baltimore to head Johns Hopkins.

In 1953—he was then the president of Penn State—he made the first of several fact-finding tours to South America as President Eisenhower's special ambassador. During the period from 1953 to 1961, Dr. Eisenhower helped reshape U.S. policy in Latin America. In 1963, he wrote a book about U.S-Latin American relations, "The Wine Is Bitter."

In the book, Dr. Eisenhower wrote in italics that "revolution in Latin America is inevitable. Only the form it takes is uncertain."

Dr. Ambrose said Dr. Eisenhower was "the real father of the Alliance for Progress, although Kennedy got the credit."

President Eisenhower used to say that Milton "was always the bright one in the family."

When a congressman expressed regret that Milton did not have an official post in the administration, the president replied, "If it weren't for his name, he would have a very high governmental position."

In fact, as noted by Neil A. Grauer, a Baltimore author and a friend of Dr. Eisenhower who interviewed him last fall, Dwight's brother "was a savvy veteran of the capital's bureaucracy long before his brother came to Washington."

"He had deep affection for his brother," said Mr. Wills. "He probably had more quiet influence on Dwight than any of the more publicly known figures we know through the history books. Milton wasn't on the government payroll, but during the Eisenhower years he was usually at the White House on weekends."

Dr. Ambrose said Dr. Eisenhower strongly influenced his brother's presidency, "Ike trusted him completely and leaned on him heavily," he said. "Indeed, Ike could not have carried the terrible burden of eight years in the White House without Milton's support."

In 1967, believing that he was bringing his formal academic responsibilities to a close, Dr. Eisenhower retired from the Hopkins presidency—in his final commencement, the trustees announced they had named the new library on the Homewood campus in his honor—and promptly began another career, becoming a director of 13 corporations.

These included the Chessie System, insurance companies, financial institutions in California and others in this country and in England. He also became a governor of the New York Stock Exchange and a director of the Chicago Board of Trade.

Dr. Eisenhower served President Lyndon B. Johnson almost as extensively as he had his brother. He advised the president on the Dominican crisis and, after the assassinations of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Robert F. Kennedy, chaired the Presidential Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence.

"The commission may not have brought about sweeping changes," said Dr. Ambrose, "but all of its practical recommendations got done—things like updating police departments."

Dr. Eisenhower returned to Hopkins a second time as president in 1971 following the forced resignation of Lincoln Gordon. The resumption of his university duties did not leave him time to keep up with his directorships, and he resigned many of them.

As for his way of life in retirement the second time in 1972, Dr. Eisenhower described many interests.

"I like to swim. I paint watercolors, mostly landscapes. I read everything, all the way from novels to the most serious books. I keep up constantly with the monthly reports by economists like Walter Heller and Milton Friedman."

Dr. Eisenhower became cochairman of the National Committee for a Six-Year Presidential Term, a group of about 250 business and civic leaders and former government officials.

Thirty-three American and six foreign universities conferred honorary degrees on Dr. Eisenhower.

Dr. Eisenhower was married in 1927 to Helen Eakin, of Washington. Mrs. Eisenhower died at Penn State in 1954, and Dr. Eisenhower never remarried.

The Eisenhowers had a son, Milton, Jr., now director of a division of International Business Machines, and a daughter, Ruth Eisenhower Snider, a voluntary worker in numerous community activities and the wife of a Baltimore radiologist. She died last year. There are three grandsons and one granddaughter.

The family will receive visitors at the Church of the Redeemer tonight from 5:30 to 6:30.

The university requested that memorial contributions be sent to the Eisenhower Scholarship Fund, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md. 21218.

50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE LEO BURNETT CO.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the approaching 50th anniversary of the founding of one of my State's best known and most successful businesses—the Leo Burnett Co., the world's eighth largest advertising agency.

The company's trademark, Mr. President, is a hand reaching for a cluster of stars. The symbol sums up the philosophy of Leo Burnett himself, who said: "When you reach for the stars, you may not quite get one, but you won't come up with a handful of mud either."

Well, the Burnett agency has not come up with much mud since August 5, 1935, when it opened its doors for business in Chicago.

Its billings have increased in those 50 years from well under $1 million a year to nearly $2 billion a year, worldwide, in 1984.

The agency has virtually invented a Chicago school of advertising and helped make the city a vital center of the industry. The company has always played a major role, as well, in the service and community organizations which help to make Chicago a great place to live, and the help it has provided to nonprofit agencies is well-known.

Its influence is felt far from the city of Chicago, too, in the 37 offices it maintains in 32 countries around the world.

Mr. President, on the night of May 17 in Chicago, friends and admirers of the Leo Burnett Co., will gather to celebrate the company's birthday at the 1985 Facets Award benefit.

To the officers of the company and to its 3,000 employees, I offer my best wishes, and I commend to my colleagues the splendid accomplishments of the Leo Burnett Co.

NATIONAL DISTRICT ATTORNEYS ASSOCIATION SYMPOSIUM ON CHILD SEXUAL ABUSE

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, the lack of justice for the child victims of sexual assault has not gone unnoticed by the legal community. In fact, often it is the attorney, prosecutor, or judge who is frustrated in their lack of ability to protect these children who are fighting the hardest for improvements in the legal intervention in sexual child abuse cases. The national organizations that represent these legal disciplines have been very active in efforts to improve legal intervention in these cases.

The National Council on Juvenile and Family Court Judges held a symposium on this issue in Vermont and has another forum scheduled for this August. The American Bar Association's National Policy Conference on Legal Reforms in Child Sexual Abuse Cases held a 2-day symposium on this issue on March 8–9, 1985, and is in the process of developing their final report. The National District Attorneys' Association is also actively involved in this issue. They will be holding an emergency symposium on Child Sexual Abuse on May 4–5, 1985, in Arlington, VA.

Mr. President, I think that this symposium will be very worthwhile in developing systems to both protect the child victims and punish the offenders. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article describing the National District Attorneys' Association symposium on child sexual abuse be printed in the RECORD as if read.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROSECUTORS TO MEET ON CHILD SEXUAL ABUSE

WASHINGTON.—An emergency Symposium on Child Sexual Abuse has been called by the National District Attorneys Association (NDAA), May 4–5, 1985, in response to the growing concern of prosecutors nationwide at the alarming increase in reported child sexual abuse cases.

More than 100 prosecutors from throughout the United States will attend the Symposium at the Crystal City Marriott Hotel (Arlington, Virginia), held in conjunction with the NDAA Legislative Conference, May 3–8, 1985.

"As elected public officials it is imperative for prosecutors to work with federal, State and local agencies to devise systems to both protect the child-victims and punish the offenders," said NDAA President Robert J. Miller, District Attorney from Clark County, Las Vegas, Nevada.

The Symposium will examine model prosecutorial programs and will feature panel discussions on a wide range of issues including, in part: confidentiality of the victim, the effect of press coverage on cases, plea bargaining and videotaping.

Following the two-day Symposium, the prosecutors will hear from a number of government officials, including Attorney General Edwin Meese, Senator Majority Leader Robert Dole, Assistant Attorney General Lois Haight Herrington, Assistant Attorney General Stephen Trott, Associate Attorney General D. Lowell Jensen and Congressman William J. Hughes (D-N.J.), Chairman of the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime.

The National District Attorneys Association is a 35-year old non-profit organization representing more than 6,500 prosecutors and law enforcement professionals

THE TIP OF THE ICEBERG

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, in the New York Times recently, a very informative article appeared entitled "Mexico Drug Arrests: 'Tip of Iceberg.'"

Mr. President, since the brutal kidnaping and murder of DEA Agent Enrique Camarena Salazar by narcotics dealers, world attention has been focused on Mexican problems of drug trafficking. It seems now that things are even worse than we thought.

In this article, it is indicated that high-level corruption exists within the Mexican Government. Though encouraged by recent progress of Mexican efforts to curb its illicit narcotics trade, U.S. officials are concerned over increasing signs of high-level Mexican Government involvement in drug trafficking activities.

Thus far, for example, there have been two men captured who are reputed to be major figures in the Mexican drug trade, along with several dozen accomplices, some of whom were past, and present, members of Mexican police forces. One police commander is charged with having taken a large bribe to permit the flight of one of the country's leading drug dealers.

There has been a discernable "lack of vigor" on the part of Mexican authorities in pursuing drug traffickers. John Gavin, U.S. Ambassador to Mexico, was quoted in this article as saying: "What has been turned up is just the tip of the iceberg." The article states also that Ambassador Gavin has modified the stated confidence he had indicated for the drug control efforts of Mexico's President de la Madrid. People close to the investigation have hinted in recent days that information gathered over the last month has raised concern that at least one Cabinet member, and possibly the son of another Cabinet member, may have links to drug traffickers or have been compromised by them. There are increasing indications, as well, the article continues, that some State Governors, State prosecutors, and local politicians may have had a role in allowing Mexico's drug trade to reach its current levels. Though this opinion is shared by numerous Mexican drug control officials, as yet no public charges have been made against anyone in such a prominent position.

The de la Madrid government is obviously experiencing great difficulty in rooting out corruption within its ranks. The main problem seems to be a reluctance to accomplish this without causing a major disruption of the country's political system, especially because pivotal elections are scheduled for July. I would like to take this opportunity to express my wholehearted support of these efforts by the Mexican Government, and to express my hope that they will continue until they are successful.

Mr. President, for the sake of the very survival of Mexico, that nation must do what is necessary to rid itself of illicit narcotics. The drug production and drug trafficking that currently go on in that troubled nation is like a cancer that is eating away at Mexican society. My motives in wanting this situation changed are not entirely unselfish, however; for the sake of the children of my Nation, who are being destroyed by Mexican drug trafficking and production, I urge Mexican officials to take whatever steps they must to eradicate drugs in their nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the New York Times article entitled "Mexico Drug Arrests: 'Tip of Iceberg,'" be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEXICO DRUG ARRESTS: "TIP OF ICEBERG"

(By Richard J. Meislin)

MEXICO CITY, April 27.—While encouraged by recent progress in rooting out drug-related corruption here, Mexican and United States officials are concerned over indications that it may reach to higher levels of the Mexican Government than first thought.

Investigations, which began after a United States narcotics agent and his pilot were kidnapped and killed in February, have succeeded in capturing two men reputed to be major heads of the Mexican drug trade and several dozen accomplices, including past and present members of Mexican police forces. One police commander is charged with having taken a large bribe to permit the flight of one of the country's leading drug dealers.

United States officials here and in Washington, who only recently were harshly critical of their Mexican counterparts for what they viewed as a "lack of vigor" in pursuing drug traffickers, have been lavish in their praise of the recent Mexican actions.

But the United States Ambassador here, John Gavin, told visiting businessmen from Dallas recently that it was too early to "fall into the trap of self-congratulations" because "what has been turned up is just the tip of the iceberg."

A POINTED OMISSION

While reaffirming his praise for what he called "the seriousness of President de la Madrid's commitment to fight drug trafficking," the Ambassador pointedly failed to repeat a statement he had often made before: that he had full confidence in the honesty and integrity of President Miguel de la Madrid's Cabinet. Aides to Mr. Gavin said the omission was not accidental.

Officials of the embassy here would not discuss what information led Mr. Gavin to modify his previous statement. But people close to the investigation have hinted in recent days that information gathered over the last month has raised concern that at least one Cabinet member and the son of a Cabinet member may have links to drug traffickers or have been compromised by them.

There are increasing indications as well, these sources say, that some state governors, state prosecutors and local politicians may have had a role in allowing Mexico's drug trade to reach its current levels. No public charges have been made against anyone in such a prominent position.

Some of the information is believed to have come from Rafael Caro Quintero and Ernesto Fonseca Carillo, the two men captured and charged in connection with the killing of Enrique Camarena Salazar, an agent of the United States Drug Enforcement Agency, and Alfredo Zavata Avelar, a Mexican pilot who sometimes flew surveillance missions for him.

A third person, Miguel Félix Gallardo, is still being sought. He is reputed to be a key figure in Mexico's cocaine operations, and is also believed by Mexican and United States investigators to have had a role in the killing of the agent and the pilot.

LINKS WITH POLICE REPORTED

Mexican officials have said the two men in custody, who have also been charged with a variety of drug-related offenses, have given extensive information on ties between drug traffickers and police forces in the country. While some of this has been made public in the Mexican courts, mention of political figures has been viewed by the Mexican public as suspiciously lacking.

The problem for the de la Madrid Government, according to officials knowledgeable about the thinking of its upper echelons, is to root out corrupt elements without causing a major disruption of the country's political system. This concern has been sharpened by the approach of elections in July for Congress, seven governors and dozens of municipal officials.

The analogy often heard in Mexican political circles is that of trying to pull bricks from a wall without causing the whole thing to collapse. "Except this isn't just a few bricks." a Mexican journalist said. "It's a whole chunk."

The Government has taken actions in recent days that have not been publicly linked to the drug trade, but appear to be linked to revelations of corruption.

ORDERS POLICE REORGANIZED

On Wednesday President de la Madrid announced a major reorganization of the police forces, which would strengthen federal control and remove police powers from several smaller forces run by Government ministries and industries. The announcement described the reorganization as a "clarification of the police functions that by constitutional mandate, remain reserved only for the preventive and judicial corps."

In a more drastic action, the Governor of the State of Morelos, Lauro Ortego, dismissed the state's entire judicial system, including the state attorney general, police and administrative personnel, in what he said was an effort to stamp out growing signs of corruption. He said a new force would be recruited from among law students.

Although there has been no public announcement, investigators said nearly 100 agents of the Federal Security Directorate, a political police force in a counterintelligence unit run by the powerful Interior Ministry have also resigned in recent weeks. Some parts of the directorate have been cited by United States investigators as a major problem in fighting the drug traffic.

Ambassador Gavin said those who were waiting for "the last shoe to fall" would have to wait for some time. "This," he said, "is a centipede."

VIEWS ON THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, as the Senate has considered the budget over the last several days, we cast votes on subjects of great importance to all of us. Given the nature of our procedures here, these votes potentially can be subject to varying interpretations. I would like briefly to state my views on what has transpired in connection with this resolution and what factors will guide my decisions on the issues which will be debated over the next week.

At the outset, I share with all my colleagues the feeling that significant deficit reduction is our highest priority. That commitment should not be called into question on this floor. The fact that we may have as many different ways of addressing this problem as we do Members, is not based on any lack of sincerity for addressing this problem.

For the past several years, on my trips home to Connecticut I have been concerned about the lack of public outcry about the seriousness of the deficit problem. It was only during the most recent Senate recess that I found a broad public recognition in my State for immediate, substantial action to reduce hemorrhaging Federal expenditures.

I visited more than 40 towns in 1 week and found a growing recognition of the serious future consequences of unchecked Federal spending. Most importantly, I found a genuine willingness to contribute to the resolution of this problem from all segments of the population.

From senior citizens to the corporate executives in my State the message was the same: "Reduce the deficit, and if you will do it equitably, we will contribute to the effort."

Therefore, Mr. President, my votes have been and will be guided by the dual principles of accomplishing serious deficit reduction and doing it in a manner that is fair and equitable.

I believe further that such an effort can be accomplished without either increasing the tax burden on individuals or compromising our national security.

Quite frankly, Mr. President, I considered voting for the so-called "White House package" as a signal of my commitment to deficit reduction. I believe that we must, when we conclude our deliberations on this issue, produce a package that provides overall deficit reduction of $50 billion in the upcoming fiscal year and $300 billion over the next 3 years.

Upon reflection, however, it was, and continues to be, my belief that the leadership package fails on the essential question of balance and equity. I do not believe that we cast purely procedural votes in this Chamber, particularly in instances where that vote encompasses the funding of every function of Government.

My concerns about that package were so extensive that they could not be rectified with only a few quick fixes. I cannot support, under the guise of deficit reduction, the wholesale termination of longstanding, essential, and economically efficient Government responsibilities.

For several weeks, I have struggled with many notions with this budget proposal. I am, however, at a loss to understand how we are doing anything except creating more costly problems for the future by eliminating today such programs as Amtrak, urban development action grants, and student assistance.

Reduce them? Yes, given the enormity of the Federal budget crisis.

Reform them? Emphatically yes. We should always be looking to spend the taxpayers' money in the most efficient manner. But terminate them? In most instances the case simply cannot be made.

Earlier this week, I voted for the amendment offered on behalf of Senators HAWKINS and D'AMATO to restore full cost-of-living increases to Social Security recipients. I commend them for insisting that that amendment be offered immediately following the leadership package. I feel that the Social Security proposition in the leadership package would seriously erode the income of our senior citizens over time, given the 3-year nature of the proposal. In all candor, I have, and may again, vote to support a 1-year freeze on all COLA's with appropriate protections for those who are completely dependent on the payments involved. Again, I will do so not in isolation, but only in conjuction with an overall package that is balanced.

The senior citizens in my State have told me they are prepared to make this sacrifice so long as all segments of our society are making their contributions. Our senior citizens are well aware of the fact that they suffer equally, or more so, from the high interest rates brought about by the deficit.

Yesterday, I voted against tabling an amendment by Senators GRASSLEY and HATFIELD to reduce the defense level in fiscal year 1986 to a level commensurate with the increase in inflation. This is not my preferred outcome with respect to defense spending. As the majority leader has said in connection with another issue, I am fairly confident this will not be our last vote with respect to defense spending on this resolution. Ultimately, I am inclined to support what I understand will be included in Senator BYRD's substitute, which will provide for a 1 percent real growth increase for defense in each of the next 3 years.

It seems to me that this will signal our priority for national security by providing an increase when every other element of the budget is being reduced, but will do so in a way that provides for a constant level of spending rather than the ups and downs reflected in the Grassley-Hatfield amendment.

In conclusion, Mr. President, we are going to be asked to cast a lot more votes on this budget over the next week. Members will all be seeking their preferred solution to the deficit problem. Eventually, every one of us will have to surrender some of our priorities. It is my hope, however, that during the course of this debate the American people never lose sight of the fact that there are legitimate and sincere differences of opinion as to how to accomplish the goal of deficit reduction. This problem was bipartisan in the making and the solution that puts us on the path to a balanced budget will require not accusations, but political will; and not an abuse of procedures, but, most importantly, true bipartisan cooperation.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

FIRST BUDGET RESOLUTION FOR FISCAL YEAR 1986

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the pending business before the Senate.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32) setting forth the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 and revising the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal year 1985.

The Senate resumed consideration of the concurrent resolution.

Pending:

Packwood Amendment No. 50 (to Amendment No. 43, as amended), relating to medicaid and medicare.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time? If neither side yields time, the time will run equally.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield myself 30 seconds on the amendment.

Mr. President, who is in control of time on this side?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I yield that time to Mr. CHILES.

I yield the floor.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, this is a relatively simple amendment and a relatively modest limitation on Medicare and Medicaid expenditures.

I have had placed on the desk of each Senator a chart prepared by the Library of Congress which indicates budget outlays of larger clusters of national expenditures in constant 1984 dollars, such as national defense, human resources, net interest, and others. Not to argue the merits of whether we spend too much or too little on defense or human resources, but simply to show in constant dollars, where we spend our money.

It will be noted that on national defense we spend as much today, 1986, as we did in 1953. Actually, if you mean military hardware, it is slightly less, because the second page of the chart indicates how much of that goes for military retirement. It has gone from about $1 billion to $16 billion over that period, while military expenditures have stayed roughly the same.

The third page shows the outlays for Social Security. It indicates that in 1957 we added disability and in 1966 we added Medicare. It will be noted that the outlays for Social Security, in constant dollars, have gone from $10 billion to $250 billion.

I add that to indicate where the large increase in national expenditures has happened over the past almost 30 years.

In terms of Medicare and Medicaid for 1986, 1987, and 1988, under the baseline, if we make no change in the law, those expenditures will go up $330 billion.

The amendment I have offered on behalf of Senator DURENBERGER, Senator HEINZ, Senator CHAFEE, and myself would produce saving out of that $330 billion for Medicare and Medicaid of about $17.5 billion—about a 5-percent saving.

Mr. President, I am confident that the Finance Committee, out of $330 billion in expenditures for Medicare and Medicaid over the next 3 years, can easily meet a combined mark of $17.5 billion. It is actually suggested to be broken down $16.3 billion Medicare, $1.2 billion Medicaid. But we should have no difficulty meeting it.

I, therefore, encourage approval of this amendment.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleagues in introducing an amendment to modify the Medicare and Medicaid provisions of the Senate budget resolution to protect senior citizens against unfair and unnecessary cost. It seeks to eliminate the most onerous of the proposals in the resolution and reduces the burden of out-of-pocket expenses for essential health care services. This amendment acknowledges that there are better ways to come up with dollars to pay for the Medicare and Medicaid Programs than shifting the burden onto the backs of this Nation's sick, poor, and elderly.

While this leadership amendment will substantially help to protect Medicare beneficiaries, it is also fiscally responsible.

None of us can afford to underestimate this grave economic crisis—a $200 billion deficit. Health care costs, in particular, are escalating far faster than inflation. This puts tremendous pressure on the Medicare Program. Congress has an inescapable responsibility to Medicare beneficiaries to do whatever it can within its power to contain those costs and still provide quality care.

Mr. President, this amendment both reduces the burden on the poor, sick, and elderly and preserves the emphasis on deficit reduction. Most important, this amendment retains the full participation of physicians and hospitals in the effort to control Medicare costs. It is only fair that if we are to slow the rapid increases in the costs of health care, that we start by limiting the amount we pay to the providers participating in the Medicare Program.

Second, this amendment allows us to eliminate the beneficiary cost-sharing provision that would have placed the greatest burden on those who are the sickest. For example, this amendment would eliminate the copayment on Medicare home health visits. This copayment, Mr. President, would be especially cruel and unjust: It would impose what is, in effect, a tax on the sickest and most frail citizens. At a time when patients are being discharged from hospitals sicker and quicker under the new payment system, we cannot be making it more difficult for them to receive urgently needed medical care at home.

Our amendment would also eliminate the increase in the part B deductible and slow the rise in the part B premium to a reasonable level. It would also reduce the cut in direct costs of graduate medical education—funds which are used by those hospitals which provide the bulk of care to the indigent and uninsured.

Moreover, Mr. President, this provides substantial protection to the Medicaid eligible population by eliminating the proposed cap and by reducing proposed savings by more than $1 billion. A cap would have changed the very nature of the Medicaid Program and would have jeopardized our fundamental commitment to low-income persons. I am speaking of older Americans in nursing homes, SSI recipients and AFDC families. We cannot turn our backs on persons who most need and deserve some protection. This amendment allows the members of this body to repair the safety net by continuing to protect the truly needy.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to support this amendment because it will enable us to protect the poorest an sickest elderly and still hold the line on rising costs in the Medicare and Medicaid Programs. In particular, we must protect older Americans from excessive increases in out-of-pocket costs. Let's be clear why. Today the elderly are paying in excess of $1,500 each year for health care. This means they are paying the same percentage of their income as they did before Medicare was enacted.

Maybe to many Americans $1,500 may be affordable. But it's not affordable to an elderly widow trying to get by on the average Social Security benefit of $400 a month.

Some will argue that the lowest income elderly receive additional support through in-kind benefits, such as food stamps, Medicaid, and housing subsidies. It is true that these essential programs allow some of the elderly to keep their heads above water.

Unfortunatly, many elderly poor are not eligible for participation or are not enrolled in these programs. These are the most vulnerable citizens who fall through the cracks.

There is a common misconception, for example, that the elderly poor are all protected by Medicaid and any changes in Medicare will not affect them. But today, there are over 2 million older Americans who are below the poverty line—roughly $5,000—who are not covered by Medicaid. On top of that, there are an additional 6.2 million elderly without Medicaid coverage who have incomes below $10,000 per year. Together, this represents 40 percent of all noninstitutionalized Medicare beneficiaries.

It is this group, Mr. President, that we must protect. If we do not enact this amendment many older Americans, including the poor and near-poor, will be forced to pay an additional $200 out of pocket each year by 1990. This will surely force many of them to forego other necessities such as food, clothing or heating, in order to pay for essential health care services. For those teetering on the edge of poverty there is no margin for absorbing such an additional cost burden.

Our amendment will offer a substantial reduction in the savings target for Medicare and Medicaid. It is true that some cost sharing for beneficiaries will remain in the budget resolution, even if this amendment is adopted. I oppose some of these provisions. I can and do urge our colleagues to support this amendment, however, because I am confident that when the Finance Committee meets to reconcile the budget resolution, it will be able to replace those remaining provisions which have an onerous impact on beneficiaries with more innovative approaches to Medicare savings.

For example, the Finance Committee can replace some of these provisions with such measures as mandatory second surgical opinions, which will reduce unnecessary surgery, save lives, and save the Medicare Program as much as $500 million or more.

In addition, by remaining vigilant of waste and abuse in the health care industry, we can save the Federal Government millions of dollars every year.

In the case of pacemakers alone, we could save $96 million a year if we just required the pacemaker industry to make good on its warranties.

These and other cost-saving initiatives could be used to further reduce any excessive burden on Medicare beneficiaries.

I urge my colleagues in the interest of fairness, equity, reason, and fiscal responsibility, to support this leadership amendment.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time on the amendment on our side.

Mr. CHILES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DURENBERGER). All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield time on the bill and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, we have the Packwood amendment before us this morning, and the amendment adds back about $1.8 billion in Medicare over the next 3 years, but it would leave total cuts of about $16.3 billion, and it would add back only $800 million over the next 3 years in Medicaid, leaving total Medicaid cuts of about $1.2 billion.

The original Medicare-Medicaid cuts in the administration-Republican Senate package would have been $20.1 billion over 3 years, with $18.1 billion in Medicare and approximately $2 billion in Medicaid.

The issue really needs to be in Medicare whether we are going to increase beneficiary out-of-pocket cost. Are we going to say increase premiums, increase the deductibles, or add a new copayment here and there? Are we going to delay eligibility?

I have looked over the numbers, and even if you accept every one of the President's proposals for freezes on all of the providers, on hospitals, doctors, and everyone else, as well as his proposal for an extra $3 billion in cuts for hospitals beyond the freeze, you are still going to have to come up with something to save another $3 billion over 3 years to reach the Packwood Medicare savings.

It seems to me that there will not be anything left but the beneficiaries.

So I point out to the body that we will have an opportunity to vote on a better Medicare-Medicaid package later, a package that I proposed in the Budget Committee, and it was adopted unanimously in the Budget Committee on the first round, and under that proposal, it did reject increases in Medicare beneficiary out-of-pocket costs. It did not penalize Medicare beneficiaries for increases in health care costs. Instead, it directed efforts to contain costs at the source.

I think that proposal and one that we will have an opportunity later in this process to vote on continues the efforts in health care cost reduction. It strengthens the Medicare trust fund by freezing providers for 1 year, and under that plan, we will still save $12 billion, and I point out that we have already saved $30 billion to $40 billion for Medicare over the last 4 years.

The Republicans on the Budget Committee applauded the amendment I proposed as fiscally responsible before it was passed by a vote of 20 to nothing.

The Republican leadership plan, the one that the Packwood amendment proposes to amend today, would freeze those payments to hospitals for 1 year, but then it goes beyond that and it cuts another $600 million in 1986, and the additional cuts are $3 billion over the next 3 years.

Those cuts are not cutting into profit margins of prosperous hospitals. They are cuts that could force public hospitals to close their doors.

Most of this additional cut would come from a 50-percent reduction in the indirect teaching adjustment. This is now used to compensate hospitals that take care of more than their fair share of Medicare beneficiaries and poor people who have no insurance and cannot pay for care at all.

Public hospitals, county hospitals, and large teaching hospitals have to absorb the cost of poor people refused by other hospitals.

The administration claims that the indirect teaching adjustment is without justification and that it was doubled over what it previously was when the new Medicare reimbursement system was enacted 2 years ago. It pays for some of the cost of hospital interns and residents, but the change was then made specifically to adjust for large indigent caseloads until a better formula could be found.

The prospective reimbursement legislation ordered the administration to find a way to make a better adjustment, but the administration has so far refused.

Using this indirect adjustment is not the best proxy for indigent care in keeping public hospitals from closing their doors, but we cannot cut it out completely until we find another way.

The Republicans in the Budget Committee, expressed great concern about this issue, but they voted to cut out the payments.

There is a detailed report language in the budget resolution reported out of the committee on this problem put in by Senators DOMENICI, GORTON, and QUAYLE, as well as Democrats. Senator DOMENICI and other Republican Senators expressed great concern about public hospitals because of the cutbacks by Medicare and private insurance, and Senator DOMENICI said that we would include language to express the committee's concern, and, "Hopefully, someone can find a way to do that."

But the report has no teeth, and with this cut in the resolution, there is no way that could be done.

Now, the proposal that we will have before us later I think goes much further than the Packwood amendment and would assume that there would be a 1-year freeze on hospital reimbursements even though the congressionally appointed prospective payment assessment commission has recommended that there be an increase of 2.5 percent in reimbursement rates for the next year. Under the plan, the hospital payments under Medicare would still be reduced by $2 billion in 1986 and $9.3 billion over the 3 years.

That, Mr. President, is a big enough cut. It would have the same effect on the Medicare hospital insurance trust fund as the Republican leadership plan, and savings would still be sufficient to insure that the trust fund would be able to make payments long into the mid to late 1990's.

Mr. President, I was glad to hear Senator PACKWOOD say last night that he wanted to add back money to Medicaid so that he could get rid of the Medicaid cap, the Medicaid cap that the President insisted upon. The cap that was going to cost each and every State millions of dollars and that was going to unfairly penalize those States wanting to improve their programs and maybe provide medical care to children who might be 5 years old or a little older.

I am glad Senator PACKWOOD is squarely on the record as the chairman of the Finance Committee. But again looking at the proposal that he has before us, where are the cuts that he would leave in Medicaid going to come from? This amendment would still cut Medicaid by $1.2 billion over 3 years compared to the leadership and the President's proposal to cut it $2 billion over the next 3 years.

One proposal that has been circulating, and one that might be a workable idea, is to set out new Medicaid rules which would force all States to collect all payments they can from private health insurance coverage held by Medicaid recipients. The GAO has issued a report recommending that that be done. But we also know that CBO says that you could get no more than $450 million over the next 3 years from some action like this. That leaves another $750 million over 3 years that the amendment sponsors say are unspecified savings. Where are they going to come from?

There are a number of ways you can get those additional Medicaid savings, all of which involve reductions in State payments. Maybe it will not be permanent, but it will be reductions in State payments and that will translate into a cut in services.

We have tightened up Medicaid, tremendously cutting payments and setting up fraud and abuse units. What we have found is if you try to squeeze any more blood out of the turnip, the States just cut back on services to kids and on services to old folks.

Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] to speak on the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I support the Republican add-back amendment on Medicare and Medicaid. For the third time in 3 days, the Senate is repudiating the Republican White House leadership package on the budget. On Wednesday, we saved the Social Security COLA; on Thursday, we reduced the excessive amount for military spending to a level commensurate with our real priorities; and today we are taking a step toward restoring the integrity of Medicare and Medicaid.

But unlike our action on Social Security and defense, the Medicare-Medicaid add-back amendment is inadequate, because it restores only 40 percent of the unfair beneficiary cuts urged by the Republican leadership in these two health care programs that are lifelines for the elderly and the poor.

This amendment restores only $1.9 billion of the $4.7 billion in beneficiary cuts proposed by the Republican leadership in Medicare for the period 1986-88, and only $800 million of the $2 billion cuts proposed in Medicaid.

The $4.7 billion in Medicare cuts in the Republican package are too harsh, standing alone. But coming on the top of the $6.2 billion in cuts for the same period already enacted during the past 4 years, the deep new slashes proposed in the present package are cruel and unacceptable.

It is true that we need spending restraint in Medicare and Medicaid. But the right way to achieve restraint is to reduce the soaring cost of health care through incentives to encourage doctors and hospitals to charge less—and not by enacting harsh additional cuts in the already dwindling benefits now available in these programs.

All of the proposed Republican beneficiary cuts are objectionable and all of them should be restored—just as we restored the full COLA in Social Security. But adopting this amendment, we will be making a downpayment on our commitment to decent health care for the elderly and the poor—and we shall be back with a Democratic amendment to do the job correctly. This is one issue where we must insist that 40 percent of the loaf is not enough.

Mr. President, I rise in support of America's aged and disabled Medicare beneficiaries. This amendment will restore some of the egregious Medicare cuts in the Republican package, but it does not go far enough. It eliminates less than half of the cuts in this package that harm beneficiaries. I am serving notice, right now, that I will support this amendment, but I will also be offering a further amendment to strike all the unfair beneficiary cuts in this package.

I might say in passing, Mr. President, that the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and the chairman of the Health Subcommittee are sponsors of this amendment, but they are apparently ashamed enough of what it holds for beneficiaries that they will not tell us what's in it. While provider cuts are identified with great detail, beneficiaries' cuts are called "unidentified cuts."

Members of this body have to assume that a modified version of most of the beneficiary cuts in the original package are still left in by this amendment.

I have always had a special feeling for the Medicare Program. My brother, John Kennedy, made the enactment of Medicare one of the central issues in his campaign for the Presidency in 1960, and it became one of his highest legislative priorities.

Medicare has done more to bring dignity and security to the lives of America's senior citizens than any social innovation since Social Security. In the dark days before Medicare, the elderly lived with the knowledge that any serious illness would mean the loss of a lifetime of savings. In the dark days before Medicare, the elderly were frequently denied the benefits of modern medical science because they could not afford to pay for them.

But, the enactment of Medicare changed the lives of America's senior citizens. Medicare brought our senior citizens greater financial security and assured them access to the best medical care America has to offer. As a result of Medicare, the senior citizens of America enjoy the blessing of longer and healthier lives.

This year is the 20th anniversary of the passage of Medicare. It is ironic that, at the end of Medicare's second decade, this budget package proposes to break the promise of Medicare—a promise that has already been eroded by excessive health care cost inflation.

The enactment of this budget package would make every elderly American the scapegoat for this administration's horrendous budget deficit. This so-called budget compromise simply rubberstamps every objectionable Medicare benefit cut and premium increase in the Reagan budget.

The authors of these unfair proposals either do not know or do not care that Medicare covers less than half the elderly's health care costs.

They either do not know or do not care that America's senior citizens will have to pay an average of $1,800 this year out of their own pockets to purchase the health care they need.

They either do not know or do not care that excessive health care cost inflation has meant that this $1,800 represents 15 percent of the elderly's income—the same percentage they had to pay in the dark days before Medicare; and

They either do not know or do not care that this will skyrocket to 19 percent of income by the year 2000 even without any changes in Medicare benefits.

Let me review with you the Medicare proposals in this budget package that my amendment would eliminate.

The proposals in this package would injure every Medicare beneficiary, sick or healthy, aged or disabled. They would: raise the part B premium; impose a copayment for home health care; raise the part B deductible; and delay Medicare eligibility for 1 month.

These cuts are even more outrageous when we look at the cumulative effect of the Medicare benefit cuts contained in this budget package over the next 5 years and the impact of Medicare cuts already enacted.

The proposals in this budget package would take a staggering $15.3 billion away from the 30 million elderly and disabled Medicare beneficiaries over the next 5 years.

As if these proposals are not bad enough, they would be on top of cuts already enacted since this administration has been in office that will take $11.5 billion from Medicare beneficiaries during the same period.

The cumulative total of this budget package, plus Reagan budget cuts already enacted is $26.8 billion—about $900 per beneficiary, and remember, the per capita income of these elderly and disabled Americans is only about $11,000 per year.

AVERAGE ELDERLY PAYMENT FOR HEALTH CARE

Even under current law, the amount the elderly will have to pay for medical care will increase substantially. In 1977, the average elderly person had to pay $698 for the medical care they needed; by 1985, that had risen to $1,800; and by the year 2000—even if none of the benefit cuts in this package are enacted—the medical bill of the average senior citizen will be over $4,600. The elderly already pay too much for medical care.

REPUBLICAN PREMIUM INCREASE

Under current law, the premium will rise from $186 today to $253 by 1990. On top of that already substantial increase, this proposal would almost double the current law premium to $424.80.

The part B premium was originally set at 50 percent of program costs. In 1976, the Congress recognized that, because of excessive health care cost inflation, the premium was going up much faster than beneficiary income. Accordingly, the premium increase was capped by the percentage increase in the Social Security benefit.

In 1982, and again in 1984, this cap was temporarily lifted and the premium was fixed at 25 percent of program costs. In 1988, under current law, the premium will, once again, be capped by the Social Security benefit increase.

The budget proposal would permanently reverse Congress' wise policy. It would tie beneficiary premiums to an excessively high rate of inflation in program costs and would raise the share of program costs financed by the premium from the current 25 to 35 percent.

This proposal would permanently victimize Medicare beneficiaries for an excessive health care cost inflation Congress has failed to control. Last year, program costs went up three times as fast as the Social Security COLA. Over the next 5 years, Medicare beneficiaries would have to pay an additional $12.5 billion just to maintain their part B coverage.

1990 COLA COMPARED TO PREMIUM INCREASE

Another perspective on the premium increase is provided by comparing it to the 1990 Social Security COLA.

By 1990, the difference between the current law premium and the premium under the budget proposal will eat up about two-thirds of the entire Social Security COLA.

The COLA adjustment was supposed to pay for the increases in the cost of food, shelter, fuel, and all the other essentials the elderly need. If this proposal is adopted, most of the COLA will go to pay for the part B premium increase, leaving only a fraction for the elderly's other needs.

For the 15 million beneficiaries below the median Social Security benefit, the difference between the current law premium and this budget proposal's premium will eat up a full 90 percent of the COLA.

When Senator DURENBERGER brought the Medicare reconciliation bill to the floor last year, he said that the Finance Committee had dropped an identical proposal to raise the part B premium to 35 percent of program costs from the reconciliation package because the President had told them not to harm Medicare beneficiaries. I ask: Was it wrong to harm Medicare beneficiaries in 1984, but right to harm Medicare beneficiaries in 1985? Are our senior citizens safe only in election years?

I would point out that the Republican amendment on the floor right now will still almost certainly raise the premium to at least an unacceptable 30 percent by 1990. The increase even in this amendment will take 40 percent of the average COLA and 60 percent of the COLA for a senior citizen with less than the median benefit.

HOME HEALTH COPAYMENT

This budget proposal will impose a home health copayment on beneficiaries using more than 20 days of home health care a year. Congress abolished all home health copayments in 1972; it does not make sense to reimpose them now.

Approximately 1½ million beneficiaries currently use home health services each year, and approximately 500,000 need more than 20 visits. This proposal will cost the average person needing more than 20 visits $130 extra in 1986 and $300 extra by 1990.

This chart shows the cost of home health care to the 66,000 very sick beneficiaries who need more than 100 visits a year. This group averages about 120 visits, and each one would have to pay about $500 extra for home health services next year.

This proposal is particularly unfair because the incentives in Medicare's new prospective payment system will lead hospitals to release sicker patients earlier. Average length of stay for Medicare beneficiaries declined 10 percent in just the last year. Beneficiaries not needing a hospital level of care should not stay in the hospital, but they should have skilled care available in the community. If this proposal is adopted, the Government will get all the savings from prospective payment, but our elderly beneficiaries will be stuck with the costs.

According to the CBO estimates, none of these so-called savings from this proposal arise from reduced utilization. They represent a simple cost-shift from the Federal Government to the sick and aged.

This proposal is unfair to sick beneficiaries and will encourage longer hospital stays. It will cost the sick, elderly, and disabled a total of $600 million over the next 5 years, a cost that is even more unsupportable because approximately 70 percent of all the beneficiaries using home health services will already have undergone the costs of a prior hospitalization.

PART B DEDUCTIBLE INCREASE

This proposal is yet another burden for sick beneficiaries. It would increase the deductible from $75 to $92 by 1990 and cost beneficiaries a total of $700 million over the next 5 years.

DELAY IN ELIGIBILITY

This proposal would delay Medicare eligibility 1 month—from the first day of the month in which the beneficiary turns 65 to the first day of the month after the 65th birthday.

Over the next 5 years, this proposal will cost the elderly $1.5 billion. When the Finance Committee brought this proposal to the floor last year, their own figures indicated that 160,000 elderly beneficiaries would be exposed to the costs of uninsured illness during that month.

The Congress recognized 2 years ago that it is wrong to raise the age of eligibility for Social Security. We should recognize today that it is wrong to raise the age of eligibility for Medicare.

As we review the Medicare proposals affecting beneficiaries that are included in this package, one fact is clear above all others. They callously ignore the needs of America's senior citizens.

I believe it is wrong to tax the elderly and disabled to pay for a tax reduction program from which they did not benefit. I believe it is wrong to add to the medical costs of those who already pay too much for the medical care they desperately need. And I believe it is wrong to come back here, year after year, in these budget debates and break the promise of Medicare in order to pay for this administration's failed fiscal policies.

In his televised address to the Nation on the budget, the President said, "We will never renege on our pledge to our elderly and disabled citizens." I hope that my colleagues will take him at his word and support this amendment to help protect our senior citizens. And I hope they will vote with me when I offer my amendment to complete the job this amendment only begins.

Let me now turn to Medicaid.

This budget proposal contains many shocking and inhumane proposals, but proposals to cut health services to the poor must rank near the top of the list of the many destructive proposals in this budget.

Under the budget compromise, Medicaid would be capped at the rate of increase of the medical care component of the Consumer Price Index. Under this amendment, that objectionable cap would be abolished, but 60 percent of the cuts in the original proposal—$1.2 billion—would be kept.

There could not be a worse time to cut health programs for the poor than today.

The number of people with any health insurance at all during a particular point in the year has increased 10 million since 1977, from 25 million to 35 million.

The proportion of the poor and new poor covered by Medicaid has declined from 63 percent to 50 percent since 1975.

Public hospitals all over the country are reporting dramatic increases—on the order of 300 to 400 percent—in so-called "economic transfers." We are seeing newspaper reports again, for the first time since the 1960's, of people showing up at emergency rooms with life-threatening conditions being turned away because they have no health insurance.

More and more hospitals are adopting explicit limits on the amount of charity care they will provide, and the Medicare reimbursement proposals contained in this budget are likely to make the problem worse.

What is the impact of all these trends? A recent Robert Woods Johnson study reported that 1 million Americans annually are denied care that they request because they lack the ability to pay for it, and another 5 million do not even seek care they feel they need because they know they cannot afford to pay for it.

MEDICAID CAP

What does this proposal offer the millions of Americans who are sick and poor? It offers them a Medicaid cap that will take away $3.7 billion in Federal support for care for the poor over the next 5 years. Even this amendment would keep 60 percent of those cuts.

Who would be the victims of a Medicaid cap? Of the 22 million people who depend on Medicaid, 3 million are poor, aged Americans, 3 million are poor, blind and disabled Americans, 5 million are poor parents, and 11 million are poor children. Are these really the people this body thinks should pay for deficit reduction?

As bad as any Medicaid cuts are, a Medicaid cap is the cruelest form of Medicaid cut. It will take more from the poor and sick every year it is in operation, because the projected increase in Medicaid costs—even without significant expansions in caseload—is about 30 percent faster than the growth in the MCPI.

A Medicaid cap will hurt the poor in every State in the country, but it will hurt people residing in the poorest States the worst, because their programs are so pathetic already. In the 10 States with the lowest Medicaid eligibility levels, eligibility is only one-third of the poverty level—that's $3,468 for a family of four. A Medicaid cap means these States will never catch up. And any Medicaid cuts will keep these States from improving their programs.

The Members of the Senate have received a letter signed by a bipartisan group of 37 Governors from both political parties and all sections of the country stating, "Reductions in Federal Medicaid funding will force us to reduce basic medical care. That is unacceptable to us, and we believe it should be unacceptable to the Congress."

Medicaid cuts would reduce basic medical care to the poor, the sick, the aged, and the disabled. I hope the Senate will demonstrate by its votes today, and on the more comprehensive and meaningful amendment that I will offer later in this debate, that such cuts in health care for the poor are indeed unacceptable.

PACKWOOD MEDICARE AND MEDICAID AMENDMENT

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I support the amendment offered by my colleague from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD] to reduce the Medicare and Medicaid cuts included in the budget package now before us.

Mr. President, this amendment restores roughly $1.8 billion for Medicare, only 10 percent of the savings assumed for this program. It is my understanding that the restoration would be used to reduce the increases in out-of-pocket costs to the elderly. The budget now before us assumes that the Medicare premium paid by the elderly will be increased from 25 percent to 35 percent of total program costs. This would more than double the premium—from the current figure of $15.50 a month to about $35 a month by 1990. This is on top of the doubling of the premium that has already occurred since 1980. Funding for this amendment could be used to reduce the increase from 35 percent to 30 percent of costs—a step in the right direction.

It must be kept in mind, Mr. President, that health care now takes as much of older Americans' median income as at the inception of the Medicare Program. On average, Medicare beneficiaries pay an estimated $1,500 per year in out-of-pocket medical costs—almost 30 percent of their total health bill. This trend, combined with increasing health costs, is forcing many elderly Americans on fixed incomes to make hard choices between health care and necessities like food and shelter.

Mr. President, the budget package now before us also calls for a cap to be placed on the Medicaid Program. The effect of this cap would be to turn this program into a block grant, thereby significantly reducing over time the health care protections in current law. In New Jersey, this proposal would result in a $64 million loss of reimbursement for care provided under the Medicaid Program. This will present a severe strain on the State's budget. But even more important, the Medicaid cap jeopardizes implementation of the New Jersey "Medically Needy" Program, which has the potential of serving 100,000 low-income children and 100,000 low-income elderly. We must not cap the Medicaid Program. This amendment takes off the Medicaid cap and cuts the level of savings to be achieved in Medicaid almost in half.

But, Mr. President, it must be kept in mind that this amendment does not go far enough. We need to restore more funding even if this amendment is adopted, since the package will still assume nearly a doubling of the Medicare premium and $1 billion in Medicaid cuts. In addition, the budget before us would impose cost-sharing on Medicare home health services after the 20th day of care, as well as severe cuts for medical education. The copayment proposed would seriously hurt the capacity of home care providors to provide quality of care, since 500,000 beneficiaries need more than 20 visits.

Mr. President, I am firmly committed to reducing this intolerable deficit. But we cannot ask the elderly and poor families to shoulder such an unfair burden of the savings to the Federal Government. This amendment very modestly reduces that burden. I therefore urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I will vote for this amendment but I am not satisfied with it.

The amendment is a small Band-Aid on a package that opens a gaping wound in the pocketbooks of America's senior citizens.

At best, this amendment is a first step toward a fair deficit reduction package. I will support this first step but I will be back with my colleagues to offer an amendment that achieves budget savings without reneging on the commitment we have made to provide America's seniors with access to affordable, quality health care.

This amendment does slightly ease the burden the Republican budget package would impose. But it leaves in place proposals that this body has wisely rejected time and time again. We have rejected delays in Medicare eligibility. We have rejected increases in the Medicare part B deductible. We have rejected increases in copayments for vital services. And we agreed to stabilize the part B premium at 25 percent of program costs. The Republican package and even this amendment ignore these past decisions.

Mr. President, I will support this small step, but we have a long way to go before this package is fair and equitable.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from Oregon. The cost of health care for the elderly continues to represent an overwhelming portion of the income of senior citizens. It is estimated that the elderly pay an average of 15 percent or $1,700 of their income a year for health care. We cannot ignore the economic plight of the elderly.

The cost of the White House-Senate Medicare proposals to the elderly for fiscal years 1986 through 1988 will be close to $5 billion. This does not include additional costs passed on to beneficiaries by physicians who decide not to participate in the Medicare part B because of the proposed freeze on reimbursement rates.

The cost of the Medicaid proposal would hurt the poor of our Nation, some of the people who need adequate health care the most. A Medicaid cap would be acceptable if Medicaid roles were static. They are not. In my State especially, the Medicaid cap would cost $261 million in fiscal year 1986 alone. Medicaid has been the target of reductions since 1981. To continue this trend for an additional 3 years would be disasterous to the health care needs of the needy.

Under part B, the beneficiary is responsible for 20 percent of the cost of physician services, as well as monthly premiums, $15.50 a month, and a yearly deductible, currently $75. The proposed increase of the premium would cost beneficiaries $2.073 billion by 1988, for a 3-year total cost to beneficiaries of $3.386 billion. To increase the $75 deductible would cost $180 million over 3 years.

I am also concerned about the proposed copayment for home-care visits after 20 is shortsighted and burdensome as well. Medicare should not be discouraging home care, rather it should provide incentives for home care. Home care is significantly less costly than hospital care while also being more humane. I am afraid that the affect of this copayment will not only be a $315 million added burden on beneficiaries, but also discourage home care and actually be more costly to Medicare in the long run.

I support this amendment which will dramatically reduce the proposed increases to Medicare beneficiaries and I ask my colleagues to join me in support of this amendment.

THE MEDICAID AND MEDICARE AMENDMENT

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I join with my colleagues Senators PACKWOOD, CHAFEE, and HEINZ to introduce an amendment to refine the leadership budget package. I voted for the package because it is a serious attempt to reduce the Nation's Federal budget deficit. In speeches throughout this country I have said time and time again that the deficit is the major issue facing this Congress.

Good budget policy, however, is not always consistent with good health policy. The amendment I introduced with my colleagues from the Finance Committee will provide the committee the added flexibility it needs when its sets policy for savings from the Medicare and Medicaid Programs.

The amendment would set savings goals for 1986 through 1988 of $16.3 billion from Medicare and $1.2 billion from Medicaid. These numbers can be reached. It is important to point out though, that these numbers come on top of major contributions Medicare and Medicaid have contributed to deficit reduction over the last 4 years. Since 1981, Medicare has contributed $28.2 billion to deficit reduction and $3.5 billion came from Medicaid. Twenty-four percent of the Medicare savings came from increases in beneficiary out-of-pocket costs and the remainder from lower payments to hospitals, doctors, and other health providers.

Part of these savings came from our health care reforms, such as the establishment of the new prospective payment system for hospitals under Medicare. Other savings came from arbitrary cut backs and freezes.

More can be done. But, it should be understood, unlike other parts of our budget, those involved in health care for this Nation's elderly, disabled and poor have taken it upon themselves to bring down costs. If the Defense Department had the equivalent of Medicare prospective payment reform, we would not have had the $7,500 coffee pot.

The Finance Committee will likely reach its Medicare savings goal from an array of measures. The centerpiece of the Medicare savings are likely to be freezes on hospital DRG rates and physician fees.

I will support both, but do not think either is good health policy. In 1983, when Congress adopted the prospective payment system we promised the hospitals fair increases to help in their transition to this tough new payment system. The first year they got an increase of inflation plus one percent for technology and volume. The next year they got inflation plus one quarter. This year we are going to freeze the DRG rate which in an inflationary time means we are going to actually give them a 4 to 5 point cut.

Last year, we froze the physicians. It makes no sense to freeze the physicians again—but we have a deficit and everybody needs to contribute. At a minimum, however, it is essential, as the leadership package proposes, to carve out the physicians who accept 100 percent Medicare assignment. We promised physicians last year when the freeze went into effect, that those who participated in this program to accept 100 percent assignment would be rewarded. The 30 percent of physicians who have participated deserve our support.

Other provisions likely to affect hospitals are the reduction assumptions concerning direct and indirect payments for clinical training. These subsidies should be trimmed and reshaped. I plan to propose refinements in the direct payment for intern and resident salaries in the next few days.

As for the indirect adjustment for medical education. This adjustment is unfortunately misnamed. It is actually an adjustment for the fact that teaching hospitals tend to treat sicker and frequently poorer patients which require greater intensity of services. Until we come up with a severity index for the DRG system and make other refinements we must be very careful how we treat this adjustment.

The adjustment presently allows teaching hospitals an additional 11.59 percent per DRG for each ratio of 0.1 residents to beds. So, for example, a hospital with 50 residents and 100 beds would get an additional 58 percent for every DRG (5×11.59 percent). This ratio provides the best proxy we now have. The adjustment was arbitrarily set when we wrote the Social Security Amendment of 1983. The current adjustment may be overrich and could be cut. The 50-percent reduction assumption in the leadership agreement would cause irreparable harm, particularly for hospitals which treat a disproportionate share of poor patients. It is important we take these factors into account in the Finance Committee deliberations and develop a more appropriate means to reduce the indirect adjustment. We do not want to throw the baby out with the bath water.

Our amendment will also ease the burden on the elderly. It will allow the Finance Committee to reduce the amount of out-of-pocket payments made by beneficiaries to contribute to Medicare savings.

The leadership package askes a lot of beneficiaries. Under its provision the Congress would likely move to raise part B premium to 35 percent of the program costs, increase the deductible for part B by indexing it, and require $4.80 beneficiary home health copayment per visit after 20 free visits.

Some combination of these cost increases for Medicare eligible individuals will likely be dropped. This amendment assumes we would reduce the part B premium increase to 30 percent of program costs and, eliminate the home health copayment.

The increase in part B premium is warranted. The program was designed for the Federal Government to contribute 50 percent of the costs and the beneficiaries to pay the other half. Over the last 10 years, the Government portion, from general revenues, has increased 594 percent, while the out-of-pocket premium costs to the beneficiaries went up 132 percent.

The problem with raising premiums and deductibles for Medicare is that it affects the rich and poor alike. 14.1 percent of the elderly live below the poverty line. Another 30 to 40 percent live on minimal fixed incomes and may be totally dependent on Social Security. For the low income elderly the higher cost sharing is unfair.

I proposed in the part B Premium Redistribution Act last session that Congress design a graduated premium which asks for greater contribution from the elderly who can afford additional out-of-pocket expenses while reducing premiums for the poor beneficiaries. My bill would have reduced the monthly premium and raised the contribution toward Medicare from the better off on their tax forms.

It may not be the time politically to move to this concept of graduated contributions for Medicare beneficiaries. Although it is not coincidential that Paul Kirk, Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, suggested we examine this approach only a few weeks ago. The powers that be in his party compelled him to change his tone. But, the fact that he even suggested it politically indicates that even Senator KENNEDY's former colleagues are beginning to realize how unfair to the poor, the taxpayers and all of us it is to give the rich and poor alike the same shake under part B and the other social insurance programs regardless of their means.

Our amendment also reduces the savings achieved from Medicaid from the leadership budget package. The leadership budget package assumes that $2,010 billion would come from a cap on Federal contribution to Medicaid. Instead the amendment sets a goal of $1.2 billion which can be achieved through administrative reform. This is as far as we should go.

Medicaid is becoming less and less adequate as a health care program for the poor. The proportion of the Nation's poor and near poor covered by Medicaid declined from 63 percent in 1975 to under 50 percent today. Medicaid programs in 14 States covered fewer than ⅓ of the poor in 1980 and coverage has continued to decline since that time. In 1984, Medicaid eligibility began at incomes 22 percent below the poverty level in five States.

The cap would preempt States such as South Carolina and Mississippi from expanding their base. Mississippi has a particularly worrisome infant mortality problem—capping Medicaid would limit the State's ability to reduce its infant mortality.

Also, it has been argued that States have not done enough to keep Medicaid costs down. This is untrue and unfair. A cap will not provide the incentives needed for States to cut costs. They have sufficient constraints already. A cap would only cut into current benefits.

In virtually every State Medicaid already pays physicians far less than the Federal Medicare levels. It has been estimated that to increase State Medicaid physician fees to Federal levels, Medicaid expenditures on physician services would need to be increased by 55.7 percent. Yet, in Ohio, for example, payment by Medicaid to doctors and hospitals has not increased since 1970.

In fact, Medicaid rates are so low that physician participation in Medicaid is often inadequate. This has frequently forced Medicaid recipients to seek ambulatory care in costly hospital emergency rooms and outpatient departments.

Access can, however, be improved without necessarily increasing costs.

More than a dozen States have received waivers to implement primary care case management systems. While a number of States are aggressively pursuing expanded Medicaid participation in HMO's. Medicaid recipient HMO enrollment has increased 83 percent since 1980.

States have been implementing reforms on the hospital side as well. Data indicates that Medicaid hospital expenditures would have to be increased by about 10 percent to bring them to Federal Medicare levels. The majority of States have adopted hospital payment systems which are either totally prospective or establish prospective limits on costs that will be allowed. Only nine States still use traditional Medicare cost-based reimbursement methodologies and hospital expenditures in these nine States constitute only 4.7 percent of Medicaid outlays on inpatient hospital care nationally.

Medicaid is more than a health care program for the poor. It is also a long term care program for the elderly.

The cap would particularly hit long term care for the poor elderly. Medicaid is the program of last resort for the poor elderly and disabled.

I do not believe it is good policy to force people on the dole to afford long term care. Many spend down to qualify for Medicaid. This is not what the program was designed for. Nevertheless, the cap would only exacerbate the long term care problems of Medicaid. Reform is needed. But, it must be more comprehensive and well thought out.

The States have made important reforms to hold down the cost of long term care for Medicaid.

A wide range of State Medicaid policies are in place to contain long term care costs. The Federal Medicare program still uses inflationary cost-based reimbursement systems for nursing homes. In contrast, 30 States use prospective payment systems for skilled nursing facilities and 6 more include prospective elements in their systems. Nine States have adopted systems to link reimbursement to the level of patient needs.

In addition, patients remaining in nursing homes are more frail because States are developing community-based alternatives for individuals in need of long term care who can be more appropriately and cost-effectively cared for in noninstitutional settings. In fact, 46 States have received approval to develop such alternative care systems under the waiver authority Congress enacted in 1981.

The proposed cap would make no adjustment for increases in our frail elderly population in need of long term care. The cap would make it particularly difficult to meet growing needs in States with disproportionately large elderly populations such as Florida, which has an influx of the elderly, or South Dakota, which has an out-migration of younger people.

In general, State Medicaid programs have been very aggressive in containing Medicaid cost increases through a broad range of measures. Since 1980, State Medicaid programs have adopted over three times as many cost-saving program decreases as program increases.

The entire area of health care for the indigent and long term care for the disabled and elderly needs reform. But, the budget process, this year, is not the place to screw down on those who are least able to fend for themselves.

My colleagues and I have proposed this amendment for Medicare and Medicaid because it is fair. It gives the Finance Committee a mark we can work with. I appreciate the work the leadership and my colleagues have done to develop an alternative to the leadership budget package for Medicare and Medicaid.●

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, the amendment before us is the result of a great deal of discussion by those of us who were concerned about the original cuts in Medicare and Medicaid proposed in the White House-Senate agreement.

This amendment eliminates all references to a cap on the Medicaid Program and reduces the savings mark for the Finance Committee in this program to $1.2 billion over 3 years. I believe we can reach this mark with changes which will not adversely affect those who need the program the most.

The amendment also reduces the increase in the premium for part B from 35 percent to 30 percent over 5 years and eliminates the home health copayment requirement.

Overall, the amendment reduces the savings mark for the Finance Committee to meet through savings in the Medicare and Medicaid Programs from approximately $20 billion to $17.5 billion, a mark I believe the committee can meet without great difficulty.

Throughout this process, I have been very concerned about the impact of the spending reduction marks. Initially, they were simply too large to achieve without having an extremely adverse affect on the elderly, disabled and poor. I was especially concerned about the proposed cap on the Medicaid Program.

Under the cap each State would have received only what it is currently getting from the Federal side of the equation adjusted for medical services inflation. The Federal match for all practical purposes would be eliminated and the program would be changed from an entitlement to a block grant.

A cap means that States would not be able to increase eligibility or services.

One of the populations which would have been severely affected by the cap proposal is the elderly. Long-term care services for the elderly alone account for almost one-half of the cost of the Medicaid Program. Medicaid assumed this role by default—many elderly individuals who are in nursing homes entered as private pay payors. Once their savings become depleted—they had gone through all of their savings and assets—they ended up on Medicaid. Half of all nursing home residents are the newly impoverished.

As my hearings on longevity clearly indicated, the projected increases in the elderly population, especially those over 85, are astounding. This means that the number of elderly individuals who require long-term care will be rapidly growing. If a Medicaid cap were a part of this package, it would mean that States would have difficulty in providing care to this growing population.

Another affected population is the developmentally disabled. More of these individuals would end up in institutions under a cap because the States would not be able to pay for expanded community based services.

A Medicaid cap would place enormous pressures on the States to limit their benefits package to emergency services and basic hospital, nursing home and physician care. The development of community based alternatives and preventive health care services would be harmed.

In short, a cap would not take into account changing demographic patterns and needs among the various States, such as increases in the elderly population at risk of nursing home placement or increases in the number of unemployed or working poor families.

Overall, I am pleased with this amendment. It is a workable and satisfactory compromise—one which I hope all of my colleagues will support.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I support the amendment offered by my colleagues Senator PACKWOOD and Senator CHAFEE. It is a step in the right direction. It is clearly better than the White House-Republican leadership proposal which would make cuts of $3.8 billion in 1986 and $18.1 billion over a 3-year period. Of the $18.1 billion, almost $5 billion, or 28 percent of the total Medicare cuts, would come directly from increased charges to Medicare beneficiaries. The leadership proposal also caps the Medicaid Program, a move vehemently opposed by many State officials.

The amendment before us eliminates the Medicaid cap and somewhat reduces the amount of out-of-pocket costs to beneficiaries under the leadership proposal.

Medicare beneficiaries already pay far too much out-of-pocket costs for medical care—an average of $1,500 per person or one dollar in every seven of already limited income.

Medicare only covers 40 percent of the elderly's Medical costs. It is not fair to add to this burden by further reducing Medicare's limited benefits. We should not further victimize our elderly for an excessive medical cost inflation they did not create and cannot cure.

I am also supporting this amendment because of my concern for the severe underpayment to hospitals that serve a significantly disproportionate number of low income and Medicare patients. Because such hospitals are already, in effect, heavily dependent on the Medicare Program, continued underpayment threatens their very survival. I am not willing to add on to an already inadequate reimbursement level.

We have already made significant progress in Medicare savings under the new prospective payment system, thanks to the support and cooperation of hospitals across the country. We ought not penalize them or put an additional burden on them because of that cooperation and support.

So for these reasons I will support the amendment before us. However, when there is a subsequent amendment which would remove all of the out-of-pocket costs increases to Medicare recipients, then I would support it because it is preferable to the amendment before us now. However, since the Packwood Amendment we are now voting on is an improvement over the White House-Republican leadership plan, I will support it in the interim.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise in support of Senator PACKWOOD's amendment to restore reductions in the Medicaid and Medicare Programs which are assumed in the Senate-White-House compromise budget resolution. One major provision of this amendment eliminates the proposed cap on the Medicaid budget. Capping the Medicaid Program to the rise in the medical Consumer Price Index would not accommodate increasing caseloads and maintain services for the aged, blind, disabled and AFDC recipients that depend on the Medicaid Program for medical services.

Adjustment of Medicaid funding by the MCPI, which is estimated to be 5.9 percent, would create a shortfall of $17 million in fiscal year 1986 in the State of Iowa alone, according to our Department of Human Services. Because Iowa uses approximately one-half of its Federal Medicaid dollars for the elderly, such a cap would fail to provide for our growing elderly population. This cost-saving measure would create an adverse and inequitable impact on our disadvantaged and aged individuals, and is contrary to our goal of treating all programs and beneficiaries fairly.

In addition, this amendment offered by Senator PACKWOOD eliminates assumed savings in the Medicare Program that would result from increasing out-of-pocket expenses for Medicare beneficiaries. The compromise budget resolution proposes a phased-in increase in part B premiums, requires home health care copayments and indexes the part B deductible by the medical economic index beginning in 1987. I feel that the restoration of Medicare funding resulting from this amendment is consistent with my budget freeze proposal which assumes no policy changes or increased costs to beneficiaries. Although we should not categorically rule out any change to these programs during the budget process, we must continue to formulate a budget plan which embodies equitable function numbers and program fairness.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I will be pleased to join other Senate Democrats in cosponsoring and supporting amendments to the budget resolution to eliminate the proposed increases in Medicare beneficiary out-of-pocket costs and the proposed cuts in Federal Medicaid spending. I look forward to the hour when Senator CHILES, myself, and others will have a chance to offer our own health budget proposals.

As ranking Democratic member of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, I am deeply concerned about the heavy financial burden already being borne by elderly citizens for their health care. Today, the Medicare Program pays for less than half of older Americans' total medical care expenditures. Under current law, significant increases in out-of-pocket costs are already scheduled to be paid by Medicare beneficiaries. The hospital deductible, as well as the hospital and nursing home copayments, are indexed to rise with increases in the daily costs of stays.

With the enactment of the Medicare prospective payments system for hospitals, lengths of stay for hospitalization have been going down while the daily cost of a stay has been rising more than anticipated. Therefore, the Medicare hospital insurance deductible—paid by the sickest of beneficiaries—is rising dramatically, from $400 this year to a projected $476 in 1986, to $524 in 1987.

Congress has enacted a number of Medicare savings over the past few years as part of an effort to reduce the Federal deficit. Some of these budget plans have directly increased the cost sharing borne by elderly citizens under the program. We simply cannot allow larger and larger out-of-pocket payments from Medicare beneficiaries to become a regular fixture in our annual budget process. Similarly, further cutbacks in the Medicaid Program can only mean additional rationing of desperately needed health care for our most vulnerable populations.

Just as we must protect the 30 million elderly and disabled Americans served by the Medicare Program, we must care for those populations assisted by Medicaid. Medicaid beneficiaries include 11 million children living in poverty, 5 million poor adults with dependent children, and 6 million low-income aged, blind, and disabled individuals.

President Reagan's earlier budgets slashed Federal Medicaid spending and we cannot afford any deeper cuts in this program. State Medicaid budgets have been cut; reimbursement and benefit restrictions have been implemented throughout the country. With the previous cutbacks in Medicaid, the new Medicare hospital reimbursement limits, and tight fiscal times, we are hearing more and more about the problems of uncompensated care for the medically indigent without health insurance. There are news stories about hospitals experiencing difficulties in absorbing the growing cost of this care. There are other stories in the press about the troubling phenomenon of patient-shifting between hospitals, where institutions attempt to pass on the most expensive, revenue-losing patients.

Further cuts in the Medicaid Program can only exacerbate the growing national problem of uncompensated care. In my home State of Ohio, the costs of indigent care for hospitals have been and continue to rapidly rise. Additional cuts in Medicaid will only shift these costs to States and local hospitals, and this approach is entirely unacceptable to me.

Finally, I would like to point out that the amendment to the budget resolution which I am cosponsoring with Senator CHILES would reduce the level of proposed cuts in reimbursement for the indirect costs of care incurred by teaching hospitals. This reimbursement serves a purpose beyond providing our young people with a medical education—it helps pay for the costs of providing health care to indigent and uninsured individuals. I know that Ohio would suffer from the budget plan to cut this assistance in half, and I will continue to oppose the 50-percent reduction.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, yesterday evening the Senate had the opportunity to consider an amendment on the subject of corporate and individual minimum income taxes, and comprehensive tax reform. I voted for that amendment, Mr. President, but in light of the time limits which constrained the debate, I would like to take this opportunity to expand upon the points I raised in my colloquy at that time.

The amendment is simple, and advances a principle which I have long supported: substantial tax reform which makes the Tax Code fairer. It does this by insuring that those who use loopholes to escape taxation are made to pay their fair share, and by lowering the burden on poor and working Americans who are currently overtaxed.

I must respectfully disagree with those who argue that this Republican amendment represents a new tax. The Congress had never intended that some of the richest individuals and most profitable corporations in the country would be exempt from any taxes at all. It is simply the case that by employing small armies of accountants and tax lawyers and engaging in wasteful paper entrepreneurialism, a select few have managed to exploit loopholes in unintended ways to avoid the burden that most Americans dutifully share. What the Congress is doing is not imposing new taxes, but simply catching up with those crafty few aren't paying the old ones.

The second objective of the amendment, that revenues raised from the minimum tax be used to lower rates and increase the zero-bracket amount of income for tax purposes, is also a goal that I support. It is important to note, however, that the extent to which such changes are implemented must be considered within the overall process of deficit reduction and comprehensive tax reform. In this connection, I feel it is important to remember that the administration, most Members of Congress, and virtually all of the Nation's most respected economists continue to argue that genuine deficit reduction must take priority over tax reform.

It is in this context that I cast my vote in support of the Dole-Packwood amendment yesterday.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I offer this amendment for myself, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. HELMS, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. DENTON.

The essence of the budget is making hard decisions, setting priorities, and in that spirit, this amendment aims to transfer funds from function 750, administration of justice, to function 350, the agricultural function. It transfers $300 million, the amount funded for legal services under function 750, to the agriculture function, function 350.

Mr. President, these funds transferred from Legal Services to agriculture would be sufficient, for example, to provide crop insurance and soil and water conservation. I think it is important in times of tight budgets that we set priorities, that we look at the importance of programs. We face great difficulties in rural America. We know that there have to be changes in farm policy, that we have to move toward a market oriented agriculture. But I do not think anyone who represents rural America, as I do in rural Texas, believes that that transition is going to be easy. It is going to be extremely difficult. What I am attempting to do in this amendment is give us greater flexibility in that transition by terminating an important program, an important program with a big constituency but yet in my opinion not a program as important as agriculture, not a program as important as crop insurance, not a program as important as soil and water conservation, by removing funding equivalent to the amount in the budget for Legal Services and transferring that money to function 350.

Now, Mr. President, it does not take a long litany of explanation to outline problems with legal services, and rather than engaging in a protracted debate, I would simply like to read my colleagues a few examples of the abuses of the legal services that are contained in a new book that is coming out from two distinguished economists who happen to be students of students of mine, Dr. John T. Bennett and Dr. Thomas DeLorenzo, both at George Mason University. This book is entitled "Taxpayer Funded Politics."

Let me outline to you some examples of what I believe the public conceives to be a misuse of funds under Legal Services.

No. 1, the California Legal Service assistants sued the University of California to stop research that would have improved agricultural productivity. According to the complaint, the development of labor saving and cost reducing farm machinery would "benefit narrow groups of agribusiness interests with no valid public purpose and contribute to agricultural unemployment or the displacement of farm workers."

A second example; In New York, the Legal Services sued to have welfare benefits paid to an illegal alien. In Tampa, FL, the bay area Legal Services Administration persuaded the Federal district court to prevent the implementation of a statewide functional literacy test as a prerequisite for high school graduation.

In Youngstown, OH, the East Ohio Valley Services Corp., sued the United States Steel Corp., to require the company to sell its mill to a community organization that received taxpayer subsidies.

Legal services grantees in Maine, Colorado, Massachusetts, and South Carolina have sued to reclaim hundreds of thousands of acres for Indian tribes. According to the Legal Services Corporation grantee, two-thirds of the State of Maine should revert to Indian tribes.

Legal Services Corporation grantees have argued that alcoholics should receive supplemental security benefits.

I could go on and on. One interesting suit in an era where we talk about hammers and toilet seats as they relate to defense, local legal service organizations in Montana, Iowa, and

Connecticut have sued to force State governments to use taxpayer funds for sex-change operations. One suit sought $7,000 to $10,000 to relieve "frustration, depression, and anxiety" caused by "gender identity conditions."

Now, Mr. President, we are down to making choices in trying to bring spending under control. I submit that my colleagues should get a copy of this book and read hundreds of other abuses of Legal Services and other funded public entities, but my point is not that Legal Services does no good. My point is that in an era of tight budgets we have to set priorities. I hear a lot of people say "Cut across the board," but when I run out of money at the end of the month, I do not say to my two sons, "We are going to go to the movie house a little less and we are going to drink a little less milk." I say, "We are just not going to the movie house."

My point is that if we look at the difficult choices in agriculture, if we look at crop insurance and soil and water conservation, the relative needs and benefits, if we weigh that against Legal Services, they are so overwhelming that I am hopeful the Senate will decide to transfer this $300 million from function 750 to function 350 to allow us to proceed to fund crop insurance and soil and water conservation at the expense of Legal Services.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a quesiton?

Mr. GRAMM. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank my friend for yielding. Can I conclude the Senator has made a determination that he would like to eliminate Legal Services?

Mr. GRAMM. I am providing a budgetary transfer that would eliminate the amount of money currently expended on Legal Services from function 750 and transfer those funds to function 350. My clear intent, and the chairman of the Agriculture Committee as a cosponsor of this amendment, is to take those funds and use them to ease our transition into a new era of market-oriented agriculture.

I have also made the point that the amount of funds transferred is roughly equivalent to the funds on which we currently face a shortfall under this budget in crop insurance and soil and water conservation.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator answer this: If the amendment were to fail, would he care to submit an amendment to eliminate legal services?

Mr. GRAMM. I am not going to speculate on the amendment failing. I hope it is going to be adopted.

I think that if we went out and submitted to the American people whether they wanted their money used to fund sex changes or to fund crop insurance and water conservation, whether they thought the problems of this country were going to be solved in the courtroom or in the fields on our farms, the answer would be overwhelming; and I hope the Senate will reflect the public will.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, who can yield time to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader, from the time in opposition.

Mr. CHILES. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Senator from Florida.

Mr. President, the needs for additional funds in soil and water conservation and crop insurance are patently clear, and they must be provided. However, if we are going to attempt to make this particular transfer, it probably will not work. I think every Member of the Senate knows that I am not a lawyer. That is not my profession. So I must make my individual judgment on the need for legal services on the basis of advice from members of the bar in my State and pay some attention to it.

The members of the bar of Montana are in favor of continuing legal services. The last I heard, the American Bar Association made a very staunch defense of the need for legal services.

One of our sons is a practicing attorney in Montana, and he tells me about the pro bono work that the law firm he works for does for the community, the area they serve in Montana. That is pro bono work; and he, as the youngest member of this law firm, gets to do a lot of pro bono work that firm does for the community. That is well and good, and I am pleased that the profession of law takes that upon themselves, those in private practice, to do pro bono work.

However, in addition, I am impressed when they tell me that they feel that Legal Services is necessary in Montana to do the basic work that is not provided for those who cannot afford to hire attorneys.

I will, of course, follow the advice of those who are in that profession in the State of Montana, and I will follow the advice, as I understand it, the very staunch advice and recommendation, of the American Bar Association, and I will vote to retain Legal Services.

This is like drawing a red herring across your track, and you are expected to smell it and sniff it and follow it and say this could be more money for agriculture. Knowing how urgently those funds are need for soil conservation work and for crop insurance, perhaps the authors of this amendment would expect me to vote with them on this particular transfer. However, that is not the case at all. I shall not vote with them on this amendment. I oppose the amendment, for the reasons I have stated, in considering the need for Legal Services.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend?

Mr. MELCHER. I ask for 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not the question. The question is that this is like a noisy den of kindergarten people. The staff should stop talking or leave. Let us give our colleague the dignity and respect of hearing him, without this commotion.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, when it comes time to determine how much we are going to have for soil conservation, we must have more. Since it is an investment in the future and one that will help this country's economy, I suspect that the majority votes in the Senate will be to make the addition of funds that are essential for soil conservation. I think the same can be said for crop insurance.

So I suggest that we be very careful. I vigorously oppose the amendment. I shall not vote for it. I ask other Members of the Senate to vote their own consciences, on the basis of whether or not we should retain Legal Services, and then face the matter of soil conservation and Federal crop insurance at a later time.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I thank the Senator from Florida.

Mr. President, I join my colleagues from Montana in saying that we have needs in the field of agriculture.

I also agree with my friend from Texas when he said that we have to set priorities. The difficulty with this amendment is that it sets the wrong priorities.

What they have done is to look over this whole field of where we have money in the Federal budget. They looked at the defense field and said, "No, we can't touch anything there." They looked at the revenue field and said, "No, we better not hit General Electric," whose net income is $6.5 billion and is not paying a penny.

They looked over the whole landscape, and they finally found this little agency that provides legal services for the poorest in our society; and they said, "Let's give this money from the poorest of the poor and put it in the field of agriculture."

I come from an agricultural State and I want to see agriculture prosper, but I do not want to do it out of the hides of the poor people of this Nation.

My friend from Texas cites abuses. He could get two of his students to write a book about abuses in the field of agriculture. He could get two of his students to write a book about abuses in any field. Obviously, you can get a book about abuses in the field of religion.

The gauge of something is not whether there are occasional abuses but whether the program as a whole is a good program and a needed program.

Let me just give you a practical example I know of just recently. A family of very, very limited means finally got together enough money to buy a little refrigerator, and the refrigerator did not work, and they could not get any satisfaction from the local store. So they went to Legal Services, the only kind of an out they have.

This may not be the intent of my friend from Texas, but what he is doing is saying to those poor families, "Sorry, you are not going to get any help."

I think there are ways of solving our budget problems without reaching down to the poorest of the poor, as this amendment does, and I sincerely hope that this amendment is rejected and rejected resoundingly.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, our colleagues from Montana and Illinois have outlined in the most classic terms why we are jeopardizing the greatest recovery in the postwar period. The truth is they are for everything. They want crop insurance. They want soil and water conservation. They want Legal Services. They cut defense yesterday by $17 billion. The problem is they do not want to make choices except the choice to raise taxes on the working people of this country.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAMM. I will yield when I am finished.

Except the choice of jeopardizing the recovery that brought jobs, hope, and opportunity to our people; except the choice of jeopardizing the 7.5 million jobs we have created in the last 3 years; except the choice of jeopardizing the progress we have made in bringing inflation under control.

I say to my friends the budget is about priorities, not a priority that says I am for A and I am for B and we are going to take the money from the guy behind the tree—not those kinds of choices. It is choices among priorities within the budget.

We cut defense yesterday by $17 billion. My colleague talks about passing over defense. Defense has not been passed over .

What I have done here is taken two sets of programs, a program that has been greatly abused, and a program that needs funding as a transition to difficult times.

I do not accept the logic that the solution is simply to fund both. My logic is it is time to make a choice, and what this amendment does is it makes the choice. It lets the people of this country know in terms of relative priorities are we going to solve the problems of America in the courthouse, do we want the Federal taxpayers' money used in Montana for sex changes, do we want the taxpayers' money to be used to stop agricultural research in California, do we want it to go in suits involving welfare for illegal aliens, do we want it to go to stop elections in Texas, or do we want the money to go to make a smooth transition in agriculture?

When you have to make a choice, not a choice that says, "I want everything" everyone has a constituency, any group that has a letterhead I am for them, it is a choice——

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAMM. I do not yield.

It is a choice that has to be made among priorities, and what this amendment is is tough choices, the kind of choices people have to make in their own budgets, the kind of choices that every business and every family faces. It is a choice of having to say no on some things you want. I do not accept the logic that we can have everything. I do not accept the logic that, no, turn this amendment down, do not set priorities, or you do not have to set priorities.

We will fund Legal Services, we will fund soil and water conservation, and how will we do it? We will do it by raising taxes on the working people of America.

I do not know where you were on November 6, but the American people went to the polls and they said in the clearest possible terms in 49 of the 50 States and in the States of both Senators who have spoken against this amendment, "Don't raise our taxes; control spending."

That is what I am attempting to do here to set priorities, to control spending.

I am happy to yield to my colleague from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. President, I know that his intent is that the transfer be made to soil conservation because he said so repeatedly, but the amendment is a transfer to function 350, which does not, of course, include soil conservation.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, if I may reclaim my time, both functions 300 and 350 are reconciled under the instructions to the Agriculture Committee. The Agriculture Committee chairman is a cosponsor of this bill, and the entire jurisdiction of the reconciliation for that portion of 300 and 350 will fall within the jurisdiction of that reconciliation and the change will be effected there.

So what I am doing is simply providing funds, taking the $300 million which funds Legal Services out of function 750 and transferring it to function 350.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, soil conservation is covered by function 300, and if he means it to be available for soil conservation, his amendment should so state. But we cannot find that in his amendment.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, reclaiming my time, if the Senator will look at the reconciliation portion of the amendment, he will find that functions 300 and 350 are reconciled in the Agriculture Committee where the transfer is made in terms of reconciliation. So the Agriculture Committee Chairman HELMS, who is a cosponsor of this amendment, will have the ability under reconciliation to bring up and consider that transfer.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I think I understand the intent of the Senator's amendment. It, however, does not fit in with the priority of the budget, which breaks down into function and despite the reconciliation that he speaks of what that reconciliation does, it is by priorities and is by function, and I hope the amendment is defeated at any rate despite his noble intention.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, reclaiming my time, I return to my point concerning the budget. The language in the Budget Act is very clear that the budget is binding on committees of jurisdiction. It is not binding in individual functions, but the reconciliation is binding and the reconciliation for 300 and 350 both fall within the jurisdiction of the Agriculture Committee. The chairman of that committee is a cosponsor of this amendment.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, on behalf of the managers of the resolution, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I thank my colleague for yielding me this time to respond to this amendment.

The distinguished Senator from Texas talks about setting priorities, and I agree with him that priorities should be set, but not in this manner.

I think we have to set priorities within the agricultural scheme itself. For example, I have an amendment that I probably will be offering to the budget which will raise some revenues by closing a tax loophole that works against our family farmers and that is the use of schedule F losses, farm losses to deduct from other income that a person might make.

My colleague from Iowa in the other body has introduced a bill to do just that, to limit the amount of losses that you can deduct in agriculture against other income to the national median income of about $25,000 a year.

Now, by doing that we could raise a couple billion dollars a year which could go into soil conservation and to helping farmers during this difficult period.

That is how we should be setting priorities within the agricultural scheme itself.

The last thing that we should be doing is trying to take from the poorest of the poor of our society to meet this need in agriculture, which I will admit to my colleague from Texas is very great. I do not know about the farmers that he represents. I know the farmers I represent in Iowa would to a person be against taking from the poorest of the poor to help them through this period of transition that they are undergoing right now.

There are other places of waste and inefficiency, other places in the budget that we can transfer to get some money into agriculture.

I also respond to my distinguished colleague from Texas that right now, because of the hardship that so many small family farmers are undergoing, they are now using Legal Services, using it more than they ever have in the past. Many of the farmers I represent in Iowa who have gone broke farming have big debts and cannot pay those debts because they did not have any money. Even in bankruptcy they are not discharged from paying their taxes to the Federal Government.

I have farm families right now that are absolutely busted, have gone through bankruptcy, have nothing, and owe the Federal Government $20,000 in taxes which cannot be discharged in bankruptcy. And where do they go to get the legal help that they need? They go to Legal Services.

So this amendment really is counterproductive for the very people that the Senator from Texas says he wants to help through this transition period. I agree that we are undergoing a transition in agriculture. I may disagree with my colleague from Texas as to the direction this transition is going. But it is a transition. Many small farmers are being hurt and being driven out of agriculture. Now more than ever they need recourse to the courthouse to help them. The only recourse many of them have is through Legal Services. So this amendment is hurting the farmer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 3 minutes have elapsed. Who yields time?

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, may I have a couple more minutes?

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. Thank you.

Second, on the waste, as my colleague from Illinois said, there is waste in every program. One of the biggest wastes was in agriculture. A couple of years ago in the PIK Program 50 percent of all the PIK money went to 5.4 percent of the largest farmers. There is the waste.

Last, as a former Legal Services attorney myself, I can personally attest to the need for making the Constitution and the laws of our land accessible to the poor. The Constitution and the scales of justice in this country mean nothing if you cannot get into the courthouse door. What this amendment effectively does is close the courthouse door to the poorest in our society. Again, I say that farmers I represent in my State of Iowa would never say that they want to have money taken that closes the courthouse door to the poorest of the poor to help them in agriculture.

There are many, many other areas in which we can reduce waste and inefficiency and fraud and abuse. But this is one area that we cannot take money from and close the courthouse doors, as I said, to the poorest of the poor. I yield back my time.

I thank my colleague.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, as the majority leader indicated, we would like to move along. As far as we are concerned, we have two additional requests for time: Senator CRANSTON and Senator RUDMAN. We hope then that we can yield back the balance of our time pending any further request. But at this time I yield to Senator CRANSTON for 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, once more we have an amendment before the Senate which seeks to eliminate funding for the Legal Services Program. Once more, I rise in opposition to efforts to terminate this vital program.

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States has repeatedly refused to go along with the desire of the Reagan administration to terminate the Legal Services Program.

The reason is simple: A bipartisan majority of this body and the other body hold fast to the belief that this program is necessary to bring equal justice to low-income Americans.

There is no pervasive constitutional requirement that poor people be provided with legal counsel in civil proceedings.

But there is a moral obligation to do so.

Government cannot demand—or expect—respect for the law if it provides protection only to those who can afford to pay.

Legal Services is based upon the fundamental idea that the poor, no less than the wealthy, are entitled to legal representation to redress grievances and defend their interests.

The Legal Services Program breathes life into the principle that every person, regardless of wealth, is entitled to access to the halls of justice and to the protection of the laws of the land. Contrary to what the opponents of Legal Services claim, the work of Legal Services attorneys is focused on the everyday problems of low-income Americans. In 1981, 30 percent of the cases handled by Legal Services attorneys related to family issues, 18 percent were housing problems, 17 percent involved income maintenance, including Social Security cases, and 14 percent involved consumer law.

If there are those—and there are those in this body—who wish to do away with Legal Services, I suggest that the better procedure would be to bring in a straightforward amendment that would simply abolish all funding for Legal Services. To mix this in with a tradeoff of money away from Legal Services, money for crop insurance and for soil conservation, is to muddy the waters. We should evaluate crop insurance and soil conservation on the merits of those programs. If we need more for those programs, then put such an amendment before the Senate. I would like to point out that the sponsors of this amendment may feel it necessary to use this roundabout way to get money for those purposes because they are now on record as having voted for the White House-Republican leadership resolution now pending, which cuts back money for soil conservation and for crop insurance.

Perhaps that is an embarrassment. The way to deal with that, if money is needed for that, is to bring forward an amendment to increase spending for that purpose, rather than get into a situation where we are evaluating not soil conservation and crop insurance on their merits, but considering them in the light of Legal Services and considering Legal Services in the light of those other programs. That kind of a divisive approach is not the way to build support for farm programs in this body. It is not the way to build support for other programs that have merit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 3 minutes have expired.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I yield 1 further minute.

Mr. CRANSTON. I would like, therefore, to suggest that this amendment be defeated, that we focus on the fundamental issue which is posed by this amendment, whether or not the Legal Services Program should continue. It should. The amendment should therefore be defeated.

I would like to add that I am not for spending on every program that anybody can ever devise. I favor a deeper cut in the deficit than the Republican leadership-White House resolution has presented to this body, and I will do my best to see that is the bottom line when we are done.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. How much time is remaining on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has 16 minutes; the minority has 14 minutes.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the committee of jurisdiction on the matter at hand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. RUDMAN. I thank the Senator from Nebraska. The issues of equal access to justice have been well discussed here. I must say that the Senator from Texas is a very skilled debater. The Senator has obviously picked the most outrageous of abuses that we can all agree should never occur. But the fact of the matter is that many of those abuses occurred prior to 1981, and a bipartisan group of conservative, moderate, and liberal Members of this body have been working since that time to cure those abuses.

It seemed to me that this debate would not be complete without at least some facts concerning the Legal Services Corporation as it now functions. Let me indicate those facts for the RECORD.

Last year, of all of the cases handled, 28 percent were family law cases, child custody cases and other family disputes; about 13 or 14 percent were in the area that the Senator from Iowa referred to a few moments ago. These had to do with consumer finance, tax liability, bankruptcy, unfair sales, and other unfair consumer practices. Twenty percent were in the area of housing. About 20 percent were in the area of income maintenance; 3 percent in employment, mainly job discrimination; 2 percent in health; and a little bit more than 1 percent in juvenile law.

Of all of the cases closed in 1983, only 8.5 percent resulted in court decisions; 5.5 percent in decisions of administrative agencies; and an overwhelming among, 53 percent involved counsel and advice concerning other ways to resolve disputes. There were 1.3 million cases handled at a cost of $305 million.

In the last 3 years, there has been a great deal of reform in the Legal Services Corporation. As a matter of fact, there is now a board appointed by this President which hopefully will be confirmed by this Senate in the near future which will further institute reforms we all believe are necessary. But the fact of the matter is that in language agreed to in a compromise involving Senators HATCH, DENTON, GRASSLEY, LAXALT, WEICKER, EAGLETON, KENNEDY, and myself a year and a half ago, we have imposed very substantial limitations on the Legal Services Corporation which virtually prohibit lobbying, prohibit representation of illegal aliens, limit the bringing of class action suits against Federal, State, or local governments except under very unusual circumstances, and, most importantly, place the conduct of Legal Services Corporation at the local level under the supervision of generally conservative local bar associations.

I would say to my friend from Texas, who told me yesterday of the lawsuits involved in the election there last year, that I think that the conduct he spoke of was outrageous and I think the Texas Bar Association certainly ought to be able to bring the kind of supervision against the Texas Legal Services Corporation to make sure that kind of abuse does not recur.

Mr. President, let me simply say that in every program this Government is involved with there is abuse. I can say fairly as one who, as attorney general for New Hampshire, was probably sued by the Legal Services Corporation more than anyone else in this body, that I came here with a view of helping to reform that system. I believe it has been reformed. I believe it has broad bipartisan support. Quite frankly, Mr. President, I do not believe this is the time to throw out the baby with the bathwater. I think this particular amendment ought to be overwhelmingly rejected.

I thank the Chair and I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I, too, want to join those who have spoken to this body this morning urging that the Senate reject the proposal of the Senator from Texas. There is no question about what the purpose of that amendment is. That is to basically end the Legal Services Program in our country.

The Senator from Texas points out some of the alleged abuses, abuses as he perceives them.

The fact of the matter is that this administration now has a responsibility, having made the recommendations to this body for the administration of that program, bears a very heavy responsibility, to insure that that program is adequately administered.

In the Human Resources Committee, at the time of the reauthorization, we are reviewing the performance of that board.

The cases which the Senator from Texas mentioned here today, and the failure of effective administration, is really something that ought to be directed toward the administration rather than to the merits of the particular program.

Basically, Mr. President, we are going to decide today whether we are going to put the dollar sign on the courthouses of this country. We know that the most powerful corporations have resources to be able to defend their interest. The wealthiest individuals have the resources to be able to defend themselves and to bring cases when they feel aggrieved.

The real question is whether we are going to say that the Constitution of the United States is only going to apply to those individuals and those institutions which have resources, or whether we are going to say that we believe the Constitution of the United States is going to be made available to all Americans, and that those Americans from a variety of different circumstances, who are deprived of resources, will at least be able to bring their petitions to a legal service group in their local communities where they are served and to have those issues adjudicated in a court of law.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. President, more than 75 percent of the cases that are brought by the Legal Service lawyers are brought successfully. If the amendment of the Senator from Texas carries, we are basically saying to millions of Americans that their legitimate and rightful complaints are going to be denied to them in our country at this time.

In the time that is available, I will not mention both the types of individuals who are most affected and who are utilizing these services, Mr. President, because they have been referred to during the course of this brief debate. But I think, Mr. President, if we are going to say that the rule of law should apply equally across our society that we do not want to say the rule of law will apply equally to all those Americans except the neediest in our society and they basically will be denied access to a judicial system.

There are those countries which deny that opportunity to millions of their citizens. They are the ones that exist under the kinds of regimes of the extreme left and right.

I would hope, Mr. President, that we would not, in this vote this afternoon, say to those people of limited financial means that the courthouse doors are closed to them. They have legitimate interests, causes, and rights, but we are not going to see that those rights are protected.

I think that is basically a flawed argument. I think it is disingenuous, and I think it is fundamentally and basically wrong. I would hope the amendment would be defeated.

Mr. CHILES. How much time remains on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixteen minutes for the Senator from Texas and 6 minutes to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a litany of abuses that I have referred to be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the litany was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLITICS AND JURISPRUDENCE: ILLEGALITIES AT THE LEGAL SERVICES CORPORATION

In 1965, for the first time the federal government allocated taxpayer funds to provide civil legal services to the poor. In that year, the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) began awarding these funds to local nonprofit corporations—primarily legal aid societies that had formerly been supported by charitable contributions, some local and state governmental grants, and the United Way. By 1970, federal funding for legal services through OEO amounted to about $71.5 million per year. In response to President Nixon's decision to reorganize the executive branch, based on recommendations made by the Ash Commission, Congress enacted legislation in 1974 to established the Federal Legal Services Corporation (LSC), an "independent, private corporation" funded by taxpayers. The Legal Services Corporation Act of 1974 contained the justification for forming the LSC, as a corporation: "The legal services program must be kept free from the influence of or use by it of political pressure."

The goals established by Congress in the act were reasonable and well intentioned: ". . . there is a need to provide equal access to the system of justice in our Nation for individuals who seek redress of grievances; there is a need to provide high quality legal assistance to those who would be otherwise unable to afford adequate legal counsel. . ." The Constitution guarantees the poor legal representation in criminal proceedings, and the LSC appeared to extend the availability of this legal representation to civil cases, including income maintenance problems, health matters, and landlord-tenant disputes. Limitations were placed on client eligibility: only households with incomes less than 125 percent of the poverty threshold were to be represented. Thus, the establishment of LSC did not appear to be a radical departure from past practices, but merely a natural extension of services that had long been provided by government.[1]

From relatively modest beginnings, LSC grew rapidly. In 1976, the last year of the Ford administration, the budget was $92.3 million; four years later, at the end of the Carter administration, the annual budget had more than tripled to $300 million. Much of the budget growth was stimulated by the "minimum access plan," which provided civil legal services to the needy in every county in the United States. LSC itself is principally a grantmaking agency, a conduit for taxpayers' money to the local organizations that actually provide legal aid. The corporation makes grants to more than 300 legal aid groups throughout the nation and in Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands (see Appendix Table XII-1). These groups are private, non-profit corporations that theoretically provide legal services to the poor.

From a financial perspective, making the LSC an independent corporation caused a major change in its operations. Under OEO, any funds not spent by the end of each fiscal year must revert to the Treasury; however, LSC as a private corporation, could now accumulate unspent funds. When efforts were being made to increase LSC's appropriations to meet the "critical" legal needs of the poor, LSC had accumulated millions of dollars that were earning interest. According to a GAO study conducted in 1980,

"The Corporation's grantees are not required to return funds not expended by the end of the fiscal year. As a result, millions of dollars of unused grant funds have been accumulated by grantees and deposited in checking and interest-bearing savings accounts and, in some cases, invested in interest-bearing Treasury bills.

"According to the Corporation, yearend fund carryovers by grantees have been small. However, in three of the four regional offices we visited, some grantees had relatively large carryovers when compared to their total grants. For example, one grantee had a carryover of $562,000, or 27 percent of its 1978 grant. For 37 grantees, reports by independent auditing firms showed that each had yearend fund carryovers which exceeded $100,000 and averaged 20 percent of grant funding. These 37 grantees accounted for about $8.7 million of 1978 carryovers." [2]

In 1980, LSC's total accumulated surpluses exceeded $45.9 million (more than 15 percent of LSC's federal appropriation) and were more than $60 million in fiscal year 1981 (see Appendix Table XII-2). In fiscal year 1982, the fund balances held by grantees had declined to $34.0 million, but interest received during that year on these invested funds was $9.4 billion. During the three-year period 1980-1982, grantees collected interest in excess of $23.8 million accumulated surpluses.[3] Some of the grantees had spent large percentages of their grants to purchase real estate; ". . . for example, the Birmingham Area Legal Services Corporation purchased a building for $500,000, a figure that represents half of its annual grant." [4] The executive director of the New Orleans Legal Assistance Corporation, an LSC grantee, wrote:

"Through various methods, with the (tacit) agreement and sometimes encouragement of regional and national staff, field programs have been able to accumulate sizable sums of carryover monies. Over the years, NOLA (that is New Orleans) has accumulated a significant fund balance of approximately $469,000. The program has been planning to purchase real property since 1981. In order to do so, many projects were postponed until enough money was accumulated to make a substantial downpayment or outright purchase of property. . . .

"While it is true that our clients need our services more than ever, it does not necessarily follow that devoting carryover funds to direct client services is in the clients' best interest in the long term." [5]

It is difficult to discern how the legal problems of the poor are resolved by investments in real estate and interest-earning accounts. There are also questions about the need for large increases in taxpayer funding that LSC officials were seeking. Moreover, it is evident that those in legal services believed that they knew what was "best" for the poor—the dictates of Congress notwithstanding.

COURTING THE POOR?

The LSC has always been surrounded by controversy, partly because of the legal activities that it has purportedly pursued on behalf of the poor. By any standard, some of the cases taken by LSC grantees seem, at best, dubious in serving the poor or in insuring that the federal taxpayers' funds are well spent. Consider the following examples.

1. Local legal service organizations in Montana (1979), Iowa (1980), and Connecticut (1981) sued to force state governments to use tax funds for sex change operations. In the Connecticut case, the attorney for Hartford's Neighborhood Legal Services said that the city has a "legal responsibility to provide medical care." The suit sought between $7,000 and $10,000 to relieve the "frustration, depression, and anxiety" caused by a "gender identity condition." [6]

2. California Rural Legal Assistance sued the University of California to stop research that would have improved agricultural productivity. According to the complaint, the development of labor-saving (and cost-reducing) farm machinery would benefit, "a narrow group of agribusiness interests with no valid public purpose, contributes to agricultural unemployment or the displacement of farm workers, or the demise of the small family farm, or the deterioration of the rural home and rural life."[7] Taken to the extreme, this logic dictates that all agricultural machinery should be banned. It is well known that capital-intensive agriculture has greatly enhanced productivity and output and reduced prices, all to the benefit of consumers, not "a narrow group of interests."

3. A Texas lawsuit established the constitutional right to free public education for illegal aliens, and New York state was required to pay welfare benefits to a parent who was an illegal alien.

4. In Tampa, Florida, The Bay Area Legal Services persuaded the federal district court to prevent the implementation of state-wide functional literacy tests as a prerequisite for high school graduation because the high failure rate among black students was partly attributable to past discrimination.

5. The LSC grantee in Ann Arbor, Michigan, required the school board to adopt a plan to make teachers responsive to problems of students who speak "Black English" and to require teachers to use knowledge of dialect in teaching students to read.[8]

6. In Youngstown, Ohio, the East Ohio Legal Services sued U.S. Steel Corporation to require the company to sell its mill to a community organization that received tax subsidies.

7. Legal service grantees in Maine, Colorado, Massachusetts, and South Carolina have entered litigation to reclaim hundreds of thousands of acres for Indian tribes. According to LSC's grantees, fully two-thirds of the state of Maine should revert to the Passamaquoddy and Penobscot Indians. Approximately 350,000 people would have been displaced had the suit been successful. Another suit on behalf of the Wampanoag Tribe claims ownership of the town of Mashpee, Massachusetts, about 17,000 acres.[9]

8. LSC grantees argued that alcoholics should receive Supplemental Social Security benefits.[10]

Other examples include suits seeking disability payments for homosexuals; [11] requiring a new school board election in Hereford, Texas; challenging the way federal agents search for illegal aliens; making expulsions from a junior high school in Newburg, New York, subject to racial quotas; supporting anti-nuclear groups in their attempts to stop power plant construction; blocking increases in transit fares; representing a Ku Klux Klan member in a $1.5 million civil suit in Chattanooga; overturning regulations that suspend welfare payments to participants who refused jobs offered in a Connecticut workfare program; mandating the payment of compensation to inmates in a

Louisiana prison that had no income-producing programs; and seeking the release of prisoners in an Indiana facility because of overcrowding.

One case deserves careful scrutiny: Simer v. Olivarez, a class action suit brought by LSC grantees against the Community Services Administration (CSA) in federal district court in Chicago in September 1979.[12] The continuing resolution that Congress passed to keep the CSA operating in fiscal year 1979 contained a $200 million appropriation for emergency energy assistance to help the poor cope with rising energy costs. To ensure that the funds were used to pay heating bills, the Office of Management and Budget had stipulated that funds for this purpose could not be spent after June 30, 1980, after which all unspent funds would be returned to the Treasury. Even though the CSA had claimed that the poor were in a crisis situation and could not pay their heating bills, $18 billion was not spent by the deadline. Several LSC grantees—each having received between $285,000 and $850,000 annually from LSC plus other support from the Department of Health and Human Services—"discovered" these unspent funds and rounded up eight plaintiffs to bring a class action suit could be brought contending that returning the unspent funds to the Treasury would violate the Administrative Procedures Act and due process laws. Three of the plaintiffs later said that they had no knowledge of the suit and others claimed that they had been "steered" into the action by the "public interest" law firms.[13]

After preliminary hearings, the suit was settled before trial by "arms length bargaining" between CSA and the LSC grantees. Under terms of the settlement, each poor family in whose name the suit was brought would receive $250, the maximum benefit allowed by the energy assistance program. This left $17.998 million to be distributed. Congress had allocated the money to aid the poor; and in their agreement order, the litigants appeared to follow both the letter and the spirit of the law:

"So, what we did, your Honor, with the money left over, was to try to provide a program whereby people who would meet all the requirements of the 1979 program would gain the benefits of this money . . . this is . . . a fair and just way of resolving the matter.[14]

There was no intention of giving any money to poor families or individuals, however, and no effort was made to identify "people who would meet all the requirements of the 1979 program." Instead,

. . . CSA sought a settlement which would allow it to use the funds to finance pet projects which otherwise might have been terminated because of opposition or lack of interest in Congress.

How will the $18 million (less $2,000) be spent? As outlined in the legal settlement, $4 million will go to a hypothermia program run by former CSA grantees to alert people to the dangers of freezing to death; over $2 million will be spent to subsidize solar power programs; and roughly $3 million will go to public advocacy and legal services. The remaining $4 million, originally intended for emergency energy conservation kits, will probably end up in the advocacy kits as well.[15]

CSA was also to receive $350,000 to fund four positions in its own offices, positions that Congress had not approved.

"Thus, CSA and the public advocacy and legal services groups may have hit upon a marvelous recipe to render Congress' intentions moot and feather their own nests: Leave money unspent, be sued and settle as thou and they can best profit." [16] The Washington Post's story on the Simer case was headlined "How to Beat Congress by Losing a Lawsuit." [17] Interestingly, the tactics used in the Simer case had been successfully applied the previous year in the same court and with some of the same individuals appearing as litigants in Grieg v. Olivarez.[18]

It seems, then, that LSC and its affiliated grantees do not see the civil legal problems of the poor as their principal concern; rather, their emphasis is on achieving social and political change through the judicial process and on redistributing income and wealth by expanding the welfare system in the courts. They are also attempting to undermine the rights of private property owners and to expand the role of government in the private sector. Earned rewards, such as high school diplomas based on performance, are to be replaced by "rights" to which everyone is entitled. These organizations encourage "alternative lifestyles" and try to obtain judicial approval for social programs, such as taxpayer-financed abortions. Under the ruse of providing access for the poor to the justice system, taxpayers are being forced to finance social and economic policy changes that many of them would oppose.

Those who are connected with the LSC are pursuing their own interests with taxpayers' money. Marshall Breger has argued that " . . . many Legal Services lawyers perceived themselves as strategists in the War on Poverty and . . . focus[ed] their energies on cases of social significance." [19]

Cases with "social significance" are identified solely by the attorneys employed by LSC; they have enormous discretion in selecting the cases that are pursued and can even initiate suits for which no client has asked for assistance. There is ample evidence that LSC attorneys are politically liberal: "The radicalization of Legal Services has proceeded apace since the late sixties and early seventies . . . . The National Lawyers Guild, the major organization of radical lawyers in the United States, according to its own report had 1,000 members in 1979 working in Legal Services programs."[20] Legal Services is a radical political movement, and tax-financed politics have permeated the agency since its inception.

POLITICS AT THE LEGAL SERVICES CORPORATION

The LSC was established as an independent corporation so that political pressures could not influence its activities. The act established as an independent corporation so that political pressures could not influence its activities. The act establishing the corporation also banned political activities by the corporation and by its grant-receiving affiliates, but loopholes were added to the law that have permitted the LSC to broadly interpret its mandate in the political arena. Section 1007(a)(5) of the Legal Services Corporation Act of 1974 [42 U.S.C. Section 2996f(a)(5)] reads:

"[The Corporation shall] insure that no funds made available to recipients by the Corporation shall be used at any time, directly or indirectly, to influence the issuance, amendment, or revocation of any executive order or similar promulgation by any Federal, State, or local agency, or to undertake to influence the passage or defeat of any legislation by the Congress of the United States, or by any State or local legislative bodies, or State proposals by initiative petition, except where—

"(A) representation by an employee of a recipient for any eligible client is necessary to the provision of legal advice and representation with respect to such client's legal rights and responsibilities (which shall not be construed to permit an attorney or a recipient employee to solicit a client, in violation of professional responsibilities, for the purpose of making such representation possible); or

"(B) a governmental agency, legislative body, a committee, or a member thereof—

"(i) requests personnel of the recipient to testify, draft, or review measures or to make representations to such agency, body, committee, or member, or

"(ii) is considering a measure directly affecting the activities under this title of the recipient or the Corporation."

Congress also wished to ensure that LSC used no funds for "politically-motivated" training by including in Section 1007(b)(6) of the act the proviso that

"[No Corporation funds may be used] to support or conduct training programs for the purpose of advocating particular public policies or encouraging political activities, labor or antilabor activities, boycotts, picketing, strikes, and demonstrations, as distinguished from the dissemination of information about such policies or activities, except that this provision shall not be construed to prohibit the training of attorneys or paralegal personnel necessary to prepare them to provide adequate legal assistance to eligible clients."

Congress further banned organizing by the LSC and its affiliates in Section 1007(b)(7) of the act, mandating that "[no Corporation funds may be used] to initiate the formation, or act as an organizer, of any association, federation, or similar entity, except that this paragraph shall not be construed to prohibit the provision of legal assistance to eligible clients." In short, Congress took extraordinary measures to prevent LSC from being influenced by or engaging in political activities. Nevertheless, LSC and its affiliates were determined to use blatant political activism to achieve goals that could not be accomplished through judicial activism.

Ferreting out political activity by LSC grantees is difficult because the Freedom of Information Act does not apply to organizations that receive LSC funding. Nevertheless, there is abundant evidence.

LINC'S GRANTS

Among the grants made by LSC were those for the "law in neighborhood and community services grants" (LINCs). A survey was sent to recipients by Reagan appointees at LSC to determine how the funds from this program had been used. One of the categories on the survey was "legislative advocacy," and responses indicated that political activity was common. For example:

The Office of Kentucky Legal Services reported that its client advocacy included "legislative advocacy with clients and client groups around a broad range of issues including Medicaid cuts, child care, etc." The organization also produced a "monthly newsletter on legislative issues (weekly during legislative session)." [21]

The New Mexico Legal Support Project in Albuquerque responded that it had engaged in "Legislative and Administrative Advocacy Training" and the "Development of [a] State Advocacy Network." [22]

Texas Legal Services Center in Austin reported that it had conducted a "Texas People's Leadership Development Conference";

"[begun] Multi-Forum Advocacy Training . . . [and] Set up [a] statewide Advocacy Task Force." The organization was also engaged in "(1) Assisting with a conference to 'Build a Network in Defense of the Undocumented' (2) Block grant/leg. Advocacy Client Training (3) Setting up a (Client)—organizational newsletter which will network all active groups and organizations in Texas." [23]

The Friends Committee on National Legislation in Washington, D.C., indicated that it had engaged in "legislative advocacy against budget cuts in human services program . . . " and had begun a newsletter. [24]

Raleigh Tenants Association of North Carolina had "lobbied to pass state laws improving tenant rights." [25]

The Client's Council of Legal Services of Southeast Nebraska had developed a "welfare-rights oriented client group" and had instigated "legislative advocacy by clients." [26]

Women Aware, Inc. of Sioux City, Iowa, had sponsored "workshops on legislative advocacy," was an "intervenor in [a] . . . utility rate increase," and co-sponsored a Welfare Rights handbook." [27] The respondent added: " . . . the hand of God [was needed] to place the Moral Majority back into their cages." [28]

One of the most explicit incidents of using taxpayers' funds for political action was submitted on a LINCs grant report by the Wadley-Bartow Citizens League of Wadley, Georgia. A "brief overview of the program" indicated:

"We have conducted bi-weekly seminars/workshops, and disseminated information on voter education, citizenship, and the legislative process. Films have also been shown and poster/leaflets distributed throughout the community.

"Door-to-door canvassing [was done] in order to stimulate interest and participation. This was done in addition to newspaper articles, leaflets, and radio announcements, plus free transportation." [29]

The objectives of the program were measured "by response and participation in seminars/workshops, increased voter interest in the community, [and] increased voter registration, according to city records." The league also produced "leaflets handed out at seminars/workshops, films on voter education and the political process, posters throughout the community on voter education and citizenship." [30]

When B.A. Johnson filed the report for the Wadley-Bartow Citizens League, he was a candidate for mayor of the city of Wadley. One of the "leaflets" prepared and distributed depicted a voting machine with careful instruction to "Push Lever 1" for mayor; Johnson's name appeared next to lever 1. Willie R. Strowbridge's candidacy for councilman was aided by similar instructions. At the bottom of the leaflet was the statement "Vote yourself a Xmas present in B.A. Johnson and Willie R. Strowbridge." [31] In effect, taxpayers' money was being used to further Johnson's and Strowbridge's campaign. Both Johnson and Strowbridge were elected.

The Wadley-Bartow Citizens League received $2,500 from an LSC grant, and the interim report was filed in order to obtain the 15 percent of the grant that had not been funded earlier. When Johnson's report reached LSC headquarters in Washington, D.C., the political nature of the expenditures was so excessively out of line that J. Kenneth Smith, director of Regional Operations and Support Services in the Office of Program Support, wrote:

"We have reviewed the Phase II documentation you provided us on your LINCs . . . grant. It would be extremely helpful to us if you would rework your grantee reporting form and delete the references to voter-education, legislative and political process. Perhaps you could rephrase the language to say something to the effect that the project focused on citizenship and advocacy.

"I have enclosed the original form that you completed, along with a new form. If you have any questions or need any additional information, please contact . . . me.

"Thank you in advance for your cooperation in this matter. I wish you continued success on your project." [32]

Evidently, LSC officials did not want their files to contain evidence that the congressional strictures on political activity had been so wantonly violated.

This was by no means the only LINCs grant that had been used for such purposes. On June 8, 1981, Bea Moulton, director of the Office of Program Services at LSC, wrote a memorandum revealing concern about the program:

"These grants are in a very sensitive area. They will be subject at some point, I believe, to considerable scrutiny. We need to discuss the other grants you propose to make. They all call for worthwhile, very important, activity. But as described in your forms, it may be the very kind of activity Congress has specifically prohibited from funding. Maybe they can be turned into training proposals. . . . Funding even arguably illegal activity at this time could greatly jeopardize Federal funding for legal services this year and in succeeding years. We just can't risk it." [33]

LSC officials were fully aware of how LINCs grants were being used and that they were supporting illegal activities.

The LINCs program was directed to political advocacy at the local level of government, but LSC funding also influenced initiatives at the state level.

THE LSC-FUNDED TASK FORCE ON CALIFORNIA'S PROPOSITION 9

In 1980, the LSC attempted to defeat California's Proposition 9, which sought to reduce the state's personal income tax rate. LSC affiliates in California had long been politically active at the state level of government. A staff investigation for the Committee on Appropriations of the U.S. House of Representatives, for example, reported that the San Francisco-based California Rural Legal Assistance maintained a permanent office in Sacramento with five attorneys who were all registered lobbyists. Two were active in the legislature, two deal with administrative advocacy, and one worked exclusively on migrant worker issues. The Western Center on Law and Poverty, Inc., based in Los Angeles, shared office space with the lobbyists for California Rural Assistance and had four registered lobbyists engaged in legislative and administrative advocacy in Sacramento.[34]

Alan Rader, an attorney at the Western Center on Law and Poverty, and a coordinator for the Proposition 9 Task Force, requested and received $61,655 from LSC to finance the activities of the task force.[35] Thirty local legal service programs throughout California also participated by supplying staff to work with the media and to register voters in welfare offices. In these ways, federal taxpayers were forced to contribute to the cause, directly through a LSC grant and indirectly through the LSC-funded salaries of the attorneys who participated in the campaign. This grant and the activities of the participants were both illegal."

LSC'S SURVIVAL CAMPAIGN

President Reagan's election and the prospect of major changes in the Legal Services Corporation resulted in a near panic at the organization's headquarters. LSC President Dan J. Bradley appointed Alan Houseman, then director of the Research Institute on Legal Assistance of LSC, to head a "survival task force," to respond to this new threat. LSC's political nature and activities were revealed in a series of memoranda that Houseman wrote in an effort to develop a campaign that would nullify the effects of any changes in LSC operations that the Reagan administration might attempt to implement. Even though the voters had elected a president who had campaigned on a platform of a different direction for government, LSC was determined that its political directions were not going to change. Among the changes that Houseman and others at LSC feared the most were "controls on social activism of legal services staff who are engaged in aggressive advocacy including restrictions on case types and restrictions and limitations on the scope of representation." [36]

On December 1, 1980, Houseman wrote a memorandum entitled "Coalition Building and Strengthening Presence in Community," urging that

". . . It is essential to broaden the political base of local programs for short term and long term survival. In the short term, a strong local political base will be critical if we are to successfully obtain support from Congress for the continuation of an aggressive legal services program. Lobbying in Washington will only be successful if local programs have established credibility and a base in their communities and developed allies who can and will assist them in persuading their Congressman and Senators to support legal services.

"A critical means of strengthening the local political base is to develop coalitions and working relationships with local organizations and individuals who would see it in their interest to assure the continuation of an aggressive legal services program." [37]

In Houseman's view, an "aggressive" legal services program meant the "survival of committed, . . . political staff" and the "survival of aggressive advocacy, (i.e., advocacy which utilizes the full scope of representation including legislative and administrative representation, litigation and community education; advocacy which seeks all possible remedies; and advocacy which is not restricted in what defendants can be sued, e.g., government entities). . . ." [38]

Houseman conceived a survival strategy consisting of three elements: (1) an outside entity to lobby on behalf of LSC; (2) a grass roots lobbying campaign directed primarily at members of Congress; and (3) a "corporation in exile" to wage the ideological battle against the Reagan presidency.

THE COALITION FOR LEGAL SERVICES

Even though Congress had prohibited the LSC from forming associations and organizations, LSC officials actively participated in establishing the Coalition for Legal Services. As Houseman described in a memorandum:

". . . We are attempting to unite and join together in this struggle. We have formed a coalition with PAG [the Project Advisory Group], the National Clients Counsel [sic] (NCC), NLADA [National Legal Aid and Defenders Association], the National Organization of Legal Services Workers (NOLSW) and the Minority Caucus. It will be expanding to include others from within the legal services community, such as National Association of Indian Legal Services (NAILS), migrant farm workers group, women's caucus, Organization Legal Services Backup Centers (OLSBUC), state support and others. It will also expand to include organizations who are allies and supporters of legal services.

"The coalition members will be forming an outside entity to lobby and coordinate survival activities on behalf of the legal services community. This entity will be established soon and will begin to function in early 1981." [39]

The coalition's first formal activity was to mail a fundraising letter on February 20, 1981, outlining its purpose: ". . . to provide accurate information about LSC, to develop a network of support for legal services, to advocate in Congress and the media for legal services to the poor, and generally to coordinate the activities designed to preserve the Corporation and legal services." [40]

Several individuals associated with the coalition had close financial ties to LSC. Melville D. Miller and Bernard A. Veney, for example, were both members of the Coalition's first board of directors. Miller was also the chair on the Project Advisory Group (PAG) which had received about $180,000 per year of taxpayers' funds via voluntary contributions from LSC's program affiliates. Veney was the secretary of the coalitian and was also the executive director of the National Clients Council, which had received almost three-quarters of a million dollars from LSC in 1981. NLADA was also receiving large amounts of tax dollars and in 1981 received $2.195 million from LSC.[41] Some of these funds were used to hire a "full-time experienced lobbyist to work on legal services. . . ." [42] Thus, this coalition, which was specifically designed to lobby Congress on behalf of LSC, was being supported by tax dollars. The Coalition for Legal Services was the brainchild of officials at LSC headquarters in Washington; apparently, affiliates believed that additional coalitions were needed to oppose the Reagan administration, especially if the effort could be funded with tax dollars.

THE COALITION FOR SENSIBLE AND HUMANE SOLUTIONS (CSHS)

On April 29, 1981, Joseph Lipofsky of Legal Services of Eastern Missouri wrote to Rhonda Roberson at LSC requesting a LINCs grant:

"On behalf of the Coalition for Sensible and Humane Solutions, I would like to make application for funding under the Law in Neighborhoods and Communities Study (LINC's) The enclosed packet gives you some information on this Coalition.

"It is our intention to use our LINC's funding for four activities:

"1. To publish a handbook for the Peoples Lobbyists.

"2. To conduct. . . a People College of Law to continue training of community activists in both substantive issue and the process of community education and action, legislative and administrative advocacy as well as their relations to litigation.

"3. To research and to publish a Peoples Alternative to budget cuts and tax issues on a state and local level.

"4. To develop an ongoing bimonthly communication on a Statewide basis to focus on budget and tax questions and ways to impact them." [43]

The materials Lipofsky enclosed left little doubt about the organization's aims. According to one enclosure, CSHS was ". . . formed in February 1981 in direct response to President Reagan's budget message to the country." [44] CSHS adopted two basic positions:

"(1) We will oppose all federal, state and local budget cuts in programs that meet human needs.

"(2) We will oppose the transfer of funds to the states; the so-called "block grants" which endanger the rights and resources of women, minorities, and the poor." [45]

CSHS had wasted no time. Lipofsky's material included a list of activities it had engaged in during its short life, including the attendance of 500 coalition members at Congressman Richard Gephardt's hearings on the budget held in St. Louis; the attendance of 150 low income people at a "People's Forum" to give testimony to representatives of Senator John Danforth and Senator Thomas Ealgleton; the sponsorship of "massive" letter-writing campaigns to congressmen and senators; and the attendance of a meeting with Senator Danforth on budget cuts.[46]

Despite the blatantly political nature of these activities and of CSHS's objectives, LSC approved Lipofsky's request for funding. On July 17, 1981, LSC paid Legal Services of Eastern Missouri $17,475 for "community based training" programs that it had "co-sponsored" with CSHS.[47] Two one-day programs were held: one on June 19 in Caruthersville, Missouri, and the other on July 2 in St. Louis. At these training progams, sessions were held on "basic community education," legislative lobbying, referendums and initiatives, "community action," and community/media "outreach." [48] The Narrative Summary that Lipofsky had submitted to support his grant request indicated that the training program in St. Louis would:

"Educate and inform community activists about current federal, state and local budget cutting activities.

"Share and develop strategies for fighting back.

"Plan for a follow-up statewide conference in August." [49]

Legal Services of Eastern Missouri would remain a favored recipient of federal funds, receiving more than $1.2 million in fiscal year 1983 (see Appendix Table XII-1).

GRASS ROOTS LOBBYING

The survival campaign's second stratagrem was a carefully orchestrated organizing effort at the grass roots. Each LSC regional offices designated an individual to coordinate survival activities within their regions; each local affiliate was to have its own survival coordinator; and state coordinators were set up.[50] The network had four objectives: (1) to generate a flood of letters to members of Congress urging reauthorization of LSC; (2) to generate newspaper editorials praising the legal services program; (3) to urge local bar associations to pass resolutions in support of the LSC; and (4) to arrange meetings with legislators to lobby for the reauthorizing legislation.[51]

The Chicago Region meeting was held in St. Louis on December 11-12, 1981. During the opening session, Dan Bradley, then president of LSC, gave the "Call to Battle" citing the Proposition 9 Task Force in California as an excellent example of what a concerted political effort could achieve. The long-term goal of the task force was to "insure the continuation of effective, locally controlled legal assistance effort which are [sic] free from political interference." Strategies were to be developed for the media and for the political community, covering local officials, congresspersons, state officials and other individuals who make or influence decisions.[52]

Representative James Sensenbrenner asked the General Accounting Office to investigate LSC's had

". . . Sent out a packet of materials addressed to: Persons Coordinating Congressional Relations that included instructions on effective lobbying of members of Congress at the local level for LSC legislation. The materials provided were as follows:

"1. A statement of 'what needs to be done' and 'what to send us.'

"2. a Legislative update on April 3, 1980. . . .

"3. Fact sheets and background information on the LSC reauthorization and appropriation, including membership lists of the appropriate House and Senate Committees.

"4. One page fact sheet/handouts on possible restrictive amendments.

"5. Examples of supportive Bar letters and resolutions.

"6. Examples of favorable editorials.

"7. Examples of supportive letters from public officials.

The brochure, entitled "What Needs to Be Done," gave instructions for visiting members of Congress; for securing support from local and state bar associations; for obtaining editorial support in newspapers; for alerting constitutents and other concerned groups, including local and state labor organizations, church groups, the League of Women Voters, Common Cause, civil rights organizations, social service organizations, and anti-hunger coaliations; and, finally, for informing LSC headquarters about "problems." [54] Lobbyists in the LSC cause were directed to report every contact they made with members of Congress and their staffs and to asses their attitude toward legal services and toward any provisions of the legislation or amendments.[55] Detailed information was provided on all aspects of the authorization of LSC funding, and lobbyists were urged to oppose any amendment that would restrict legislative representation, the ability of LSC affiliates to represent aliens, the right of a legal services program to receive court-awarded fees, the right of employees to join labor unions, and representation in abortion cases and that would require attorneys to negotiate prior to the initiation of litigation.[56]

The Comptroller General concluded: "There is little question that [these activities] . . . constitute 'lobbying', as the term is used in the applicable restrictive legislation. . . ." [57] In a report issued a year earlier, the GAO had changed LSC affiliates with lobbying and recommended that the corporation take steps to ". . . more specifically define the legislative restrictions on grantees' lobbying activities and the types of lobbying activities that are not permissible." [58] Although tax funds were being used illegally for political activity, the GAO did not believe that there was any way to recover those funds:

"Because LSC's regulations and current policies appear to authorize recipients to expend appropriated funds for prohibited lobbying activities in derogation of the . . .

restrictions, we do not think, as a practical matter, that the Government would be successful in attempting to recover the illegally expended sums from the recipients." [59]

The taxpayer, it seems, is out of luck.

Congress has often attempted to limit LSC's activities, but LSC officials are experts at dodging such restrictions. The Legal Services Act of 1974 placed restrictions lobbying activities and placed additional limitations on LSC political activities in 1976, 1979, and 1980 to restrict the use of appropriated funds for publicity or propaganda relating to legislation.[60] Congress also tried, without much success, to limit the types of cases that LSC can undertake, forbidding criminal representation, representation for juveniles (until 1977 when the limitation was dropped), school desegregation, selective service, nontherapeutic abortion, homosexual and gay rights cases, and representation of illegal aliens.[61]

In each instance, LSC officials publicly stated that the corporation and its affiliates would abide by these congressional limitations, and then they continued to flaunt the law. After the GAO issued its report in May 1981, Dan Bradley, president of LSC, sent a letter to the comptroller General:

"Your opinion indicates that the Legal Services Corporation and its [grant] recipients have engaged in prohibited grass roots and lobbying activities. You concluded that these activities were carried out pursuant to Corporation regulations and legal opinions that erroneously interpreted the Legal Services Corporation Act and its relationship to riders that have been attached to various appropriations bills. You have further requested that I take immediate action to halt such grass roots legislative activities.

". . . while we disagreed with GAO's view of the interpretation of the various related provisions of existing law, and thus draw different conclusions about possible violations, we are making certain changes in our present activities. Prior to recipient of your opinion, I directed all personnel of the Legal Services Corporation to stop any and all activities coming within the GAO definition of grass roots lobbying activities." [62]

The "changes" were being made, but they were not the sort that might have been expected. Rather than ceasing political activity, LSC officials decided that alternative organizational structures had to be developed to carry out both the activities that Congress had expressly prohibited and those that it was likely to prohibit.

MIRROR CORPORATIONS

Prior to President Reagan's election, LSC had been able to maneuver around various congressional mandates by using a variety of subterfuges. If a new board of directors was appointed that was hostile to LSC's political machinations, then the old stratagems would no longer work. LSC officials thus conceived the third element of the survival campaign; "mirror corporations."

The Boston Regional Office of LSC was actively involved in the search for alternative organizations through which they could direct political advocacy operations. This is evident in a memorandum from Friends of Advocacy, Inc., a non-profit corporation formed to provide legal assistance to the poor, written to the board of directors of Connecticut Legal Services.

"As early as January of 1981, persons within LSC began to discuss the notion of programs creating alternative entities calculated to circumvent the anticipated limitations. Within LSC's New England Region, project directors held meetings for the purpose of discussing potential responses to anticipated federal restrictions, including the creation of alternative corporations. In fact, these regional meetings have continued since then, the next one to take place October 22nd and 23rd.

"On June 18, 1981, our fears unfortunately became reality when the U.S. House of Representatives passed H.R. 3480, a reauthorization of the Legal Services Corporation which included numerous amendments severely restricting the activities of legal services programs and their employees. The CLS Board of Directors was informed of the House's action at a meeting held that very same evening." [63]

LSC headquarters, which was deeply involved in the search for "alternative mechanisms," contracted with the Institute for Non-Profit Management Training, Inc., to study various options. The proposal was written as a "management training curriculum, " so that funding could be provided under the "LINCs" program. The training program "will address two specific areas . . . (1) locating and obtaining funding for community based organizations; and (2) training programs for client/community advocates. The goal of the proposed management training program is to improve the capacity of clients (and thus their communities) to productively advocate for themselves and use sound management [sic] principles and practices to structure and solidify that advocacy and the informed involvement that it gives rise to."[64]

The core of the program was a session on "establishing feeder organizations" to examine "specific strategies for stabilizing the NPO's [Non-Profit Organization's] funding base through the development of a for-profit arm or 'feeder' organization." The NPO's objective was "to maintain compliance with federal regulations while engaging in certain types of advocacy activities such as lobbying."[65]

LSC also hired a consultant, Gregg Krech, to do a study entitled "Alternatives to Retrenchment." Among other things, Krech recommended the "establishment of an independent 'sister' corporation which provides services on a fee-for-service basis to ineligible clients [for tax-funded legal services] and donates all the profits back to the legal services program; or the establishment of public interest law firms and social welfare organizations which can provide a wider range of services to poor people with less restrictions."[66] In effect, the fees generated from providing legal services to clients who were not poor would not be subject to Congressional restrictions on federal funds and could be used for lobbying and for financing those cases and representing those clients that Congress had disallowed.

Krech proposed five alternative organizational structures all of which could "launder" funds so that congressional restrictions on political advocacy and representation could be subverted.[67] Section 1010(c) of the LSC Act had made alternative structures necessary, as Krech noted in his report.

"Interpreted strictly, this provision [1010(c)] attaches all LSC restrictions and prohibitions to any non-public monies of a legal services grantee. Given redirections in LSC funding and expected efforts of programs to develop private sources through fund raising and/or fee for service, it might not be unusual to find a legal services program receiving only 10 percent of their funding from LSC but having all funding subject to the LSC restrictions. . . . As stated earlier, private funds will almost certainly be subject to the same restrictions as LSC funds according to section 1010(c) of the Act. If you contemplate the potential use of new funds for activities which are not a permissible use of LSC funds, these new funds still have to be raised and used outside of the LSC corporate entity. Raising money through the LSC entity will provide additional money, but that money will become subject to the same restrictions as the LSC money. Raising money through a separate entity allows the money to be raised while discretion is maintained as to its use.

". . . There are inherent limitations on 501(c)(3) corporations with respect to the conduct of unrelated business activities and legislative influence. Other corporate forms provide greater flexibility to charge fees and lobby." [68]

There are indications that the "mirror corporation" strategy was implemented. In 1982, the New Haven Legal Assistance Association (LAA) transferred its annual grant of $543,000 to the South Central Connecticut Legal Services Corporation. New Haven LAA continues to operate as a separate structure, funded through "alternative funding sources" and free of any restrictions Congress might impose on recipients of federal funds. But South Central handles no cases; it simply acts as a screening and referral entity, primarily for New Haven LAA. South Central pays New Haven a set rate for every case it handles. Although the two programs are legally separate, they are "operationally integrated," sharing the same office, the same phones, the same attorneys, and are managed by the same executive director. The legal separation, however, has made it possible for the New Haven LAA to ignore Congressional restrictions on taxpayers' funds.[69]

Using similar tactics, on January 4, 1982, Texas Rural Legal Aid transferred $760,000 to a separate entity, Texas Rural Legal Foundation, Inc., to provide legal services to eligible clients.[70] Texas Rural Legal Aid was very active politically and had brought suit to prevent the special election in Texas won by conservative Congressman Phil Gramm.[71] It is anyone's guess how stopping a congressional election would have served the legal needs of the poor.

LSC affiliates were also concerned about the fund balances that had been accumulated. At a meeting on August 27, 1981, there was a panel discussion on "creative ways of using fund balances," including "hiding fund balances." [72] Evidently, there was some fear that Congress might use the balances to justify cutting the LSC's appropriation or that members of a new LSC board of directors would recall the balances to headquarters.

TRAINING AND ORGANIZING FOR POLITICAL ADVOCACY

LSC headquarters was also concerned about the allocation of the corporation's funds under the Reagan administration and in 1981 decided to spend considerable sums on "training manuals." LSC's Office of Program Support awarded contracts to produce "between 35 and 50" training manuals to be made available to grantees, regional training centers, and client groups "in connection with education and training programs." [73]

Given the mandate of the Legal Services Corporation, one would expect LSC training manuals to focus on helping attorneys represent the poor in the courts. But most of the manuals emphasize organizing for political activism, and references to the judicial process are typically made only in the context of how the courts may be used to further such organization. For example, consider "The Law and Direct Citizen Action," a training manual developed by the Institute for Social Justice (see Chapter VIII) using taxpayer funds provided by the LSC's Advocacy Training and Development Unit. The preface to the manual states:

"This handbook is written for community organizations and the legal workers who advise them. It is a guide to the areas of the law that affect direct citizen action. The law both creates rights and restricts them. Some laws—for example, the First Amendment, the Freedom of Information Acts—can be very useful to organizations seeking to bring about social change. But often the law can stymie action—whether by permit requirements or by mass arrests. This handbook is a guide to how to use the law and not let the law be used against you." [74]

"Social change" is a recurring theme throughout these manuals and is a code word for the left-wing political activity that characterizes LSC, its affiliated groups, and the network of organizations that LSC helps to fund. According to this particular manual, social change can be achieved only by power, and power is obtained by organizing.

"It takes power to achieve significant social change. People get power by organizing. Social change organizations provide a power base from which people can take systematic collective action on their own behalf. The strategies and tactics of such organizations may vary, but whether they engage in electoral politics or direct action, community education or militant disruption, consumer boycotts or picket lines, their ultimate strength lies in their ability to mobilize and empower large numbers of people." [75]

Organizing is viewed as the only way that problems may be effectively addressed. In fact, the role of the individual attorney in helping an individual client is derogated: "A victory won through direct action by fifty members is more meaningful in the long run than a triumph achieved by a single leader (or lawyer) . . . ." [76] Moreover:

Organizers—good organizers—are trained to empower people to take collective action on their own behalf. Lawyers, on the other hand, are trained to be advocates who act on behalf of their clients. As a result, many lawyers are oriented toward solving specific problems by using the legal system to win individual cases—instead of helping people solve their own problems by direct action.

"But there are other lawyers who believe in the basic principles of organizing to achieve social change. They want to know what kinds of assistance they can provide and how best to provide it. This handbook is intended to help them and to help community organization leaders and members as well, by helping them understand the limitations the law imposes, the opportunities it provides, and the reasons behind the advice their lawyer is giving them." [77]

A lawyer's role then is to "protect the members of the organization" and to "fight back," not to represent individuals. An attorney can force opponents of the organization to "cave in" by "imposing liability and money costs on others." [78] Evidently, the ends justify the means, for the manual indicates that "exposure" is a useful tool and "the threat of scandal and ridicule is a powerful one . . . ." [79] If lawyers follow the appropriate prescriptions, they ". . . have a unique opportunity to help give real 'power to the people.'" [80]

In addition to a philosophical discourse about the importance of organizing for advocacy and an attorney's role in that process, the manual offers practical suggestions, such as how to file a series of small suits so that ". . . the opposition's costs may be significantly higher if it has to defend itself against a lot of small suits which are factually distinct that [sic] if it has one massive class action to defend, and this can enlarge the organization's bargaining power." [81] Of course, it is expensive for the plaintiff to file a large number of small suits, but as long as the costs are paid by the taxpayer, the organization seeking "social change" does not bear the burden.

Moreover, organizations and their attorneys should not let the law stand in the way of their objectives; the manual argues that it may be more effective to flaunt the legal system than to abide by it. In answering "Should a group apply for a permit [for a demonstration]?" the manual advises:

"This is a question that cannot be answered in the abstract. This is a decision that should be made by the group, not the attorney. The attorney should not get too involved in tactical discussions. One experienced organizer argues that the organization should select the best tactic for the situation, then look at the law. If the group starts its selection of tactics by looking at the law, the result can be narrow, unimaginative, or restrictive tactics. Lawyers often tell groups what they can't do instead of what they can. Choose the tactic, then decide how much to modify it (if at all) to comply with applicable regulations or ordinances. For example, a tenants' group may wish to picket a landlord at his house or confront a public official at her office. The group may feel that surprise or catching the target off-guard is a major part of its strategy, so it does not want to apply for the necessary permits." [82]

In essence, the LSC, chartered by Congress and charged with using the law to help the poor, has spent tax dollars to finance a study that advocates illegal activities. The sentiments expressed in "The Law and Direct Citizen Action" are characteristic of those found in other "training manuals" funded by LSC, including "Communication Skills, Community Advocacy and Leadership/Community Development," which was produced for the LSC's Office of Program Support. The familiar themes of advocacy and organizing for "social change" appear throughout this document:

"There is a tremendous amount of discussion in this country today about the difficulty in addressing many issues confronting poor people. There are probably just as many complaining about a lack of knowledge about where and how to get involved in social change. Although many people are very interested in social change, they do not understand where and how to begin work on issues that affect it.

". . . Many helping professionals are concerned with their clients and are interested in social change.

"For many years, . . . lawyers, . . . and other helping professionals have tried with limited success to bring about change. Their approach has been to work hard on individual cases and take on as many clients as possible. However, this effort to meet the needs of the community/client has not had the impact that is needed or desired to create real social change. As resources continue to diminish, it is encumbant [sic] upon all concerned to find new ways to complement the programs of present social/legal services." [83]

The manual also stresses the need for "organizing" for social change, since dealing with individual clients has not produced what the activists consider to be desirable results. The material in the manual illustrates the concept that legal services advocates should not respond to individual requests for legal assistance but that they should proselytize for change. Consider the cases suggested for "advocate role play situations." One case poses the problem of a "Black lawyer who is attempting to convince residents of a poor white apartment building to organize a rent strike." In another, "A white paralegal is attempting to convince [sic] a number of mainly Black and Hispanic prisoners to file a class action suite because [sic] of overcrowding in the county jail. In yet another, "A lawyer, living in a very economically depressed area of a city, is trying to get the poorest people to organize a food co-op." [84]

When congressional oversight hearings were held on LSC, there were numerous protests about the involvement of legal service activists in organizing activities, including union organizing.[85] Apparently, the training and education program had been effective, for LSC affiliates instigated or were involved in many cases that had little or no connection with the corporation's basic mission. Furthermore, this advocacy and organizing activity had been undertaken in spite of the federal law prohibiting organizing activity.

THE VERDICT ON THE LEGAL SERVICES CORPORATION

The Legal Services Corporation was clearly riddled with illegal political activity. Hundreds of millions of taxpayers' dollars were used to fund the political goals of a determined group that used the needs of the poor as an excuse to obtain vast sums of money from the government. Tax monies were diverted to elect candidates to office, to defeat or support legislation at all levels of government, to finance administrative and congressional lobbying, to organize at the grassroots for political purposes, and to fund a host of allied organizations. Many of the cases pursued by LSC and its affiliates were bizarre and had nothing to do with alleviating the legal problems of the poor. Attorneys associated with legal services sought to impose on the nation their version of political utopia, even though socialism has not produced economic prosperity in the nations throughout the world where it has been firmly established for years. There is an abundance of poverty in the socialist world, but the leaders of these nations prosper as others suffer. The LSC proselytizers may be convinced that their expertise would place them in leadershp positions if the political changes being advocated with tax funds were put in place.

For years, LSC has been criticized for its blatant and illegal political activity. While LSC officials were publicly denying any wrongdoing or any untoward political actions,[86] internal memoranda and other documents show that they were fully aware of and concerned about the propriety and legality of their activities. The corporation's president was seeking increased funding from Congress, but the organization was diverting, for its own uses, tens of millions of dollars originally intended to help the poor. When testifying about LSC's fiscal year 1982 budget, Dan Bradley stated that "the painful reality is, however, that legal services programs already operate at the margin. There is little that can be done to meet rising costs, short of reducing available service." [87] LSC affiliates, however, had amassed tens of millions of tax dollars in unspent balances between fiscal years 1980 and 1982 and had purchased $15.5 million in real property and $17.8 million in equipment during the same period. LSC headquarters openly encouraged diverting of program resources away from services for the poor by hiring consultants to develop "alternative corporate forms" and to find "creative ways" to use fund balances. LSC even drafted sample documents to be used in acquiring real estate.[88] During the same period, $2.257 million were spent for dues to various organizations, including labor unions, and payments were made to the Committee on Political Education (C.O.P.E.), the AFL-CIO political action group, and similar organizations.[89] Bradley also failed to mention the interest income from unspent fund balances that had been invested or the millions of dollars in legal fee awards that LSC grantees were collecting from their lawsuits (see Appendix Table XII-2)—awards that taxpayers also paid when the suit was brought against local, state, or federal governmental agencies.

There might not have been much money to provide legal services, but this did not stop officials associated with LSC affiliates, such as Bernard Veney, executive director of the National Clients Council, from living well at taxpayer expense. During the first nine months of 1983, Veney's expense account tabs included: $177.90 for a stay with his wife at an inn a few blocks from his Washington office; $180-a-day suite at the Burbank Airport Hilton during a California training seminar; $171.60 for lodging at a Jackson, Wyoming, resort; a $419.47 tab at the posh Georgetown Hotel in Washington during another training seminar; $10,069.51 in car and limousine rentals when Veney commuted between Washington and his home in Columbia, Md. [a suburb of Washington]; a $6,456 salary advance which was still outstanding from August, 1982; and, a $738 plane ticket for his son who was not employed by the Clients Council.[90]

So much money was diverted to political activity, frivolous lawsuits, organizing campaigns and "training," slush funds, real estate, and other purposes that it is reasonable to question whether LSC and its affiliates were concerned at all about the legal problems of the poor. Apparently, their greatest concern was to use the poor to obtain resources that would support their own socialist agenda and spread their propaganda. At the same time that LSC was furthering its political causes in the courts and legislatures at taxpayer expense, the organization's "survival campaign" was undertaken to keep the corporation free from "political interference," as if such an assertion could justify the subterfuges and stratagems devised under that scheme. Their real problem was that a board of directors appointed by the Reagan administration might have a different view of LSC's purpose and might try to alter the corporation's policies toward legal services for the poor.

In 1982, the worst fears of LSC officials were realized when President Reagan appointed new board members and officers. The response was a campaign of smear and innuendo whose purpose was to divert attention from the LSC and its activities and focus on the new appointees. Many files from the period 1980-1982 in the LSC's Washington office were destroyed, and appointees had to scour regional offices to obtain copies of important correspondence and memoranda.[91] The denial of information to Reagan appointees was only a small skirmish in the major battle over the integrity of the appointees, which focused on the consulting fees and travel expenses the Reagan board members had charged to LSC. LSC bureaucrats and their allies orchestrated a major media campaign to discredit the board members and to preserve the corporation. The media rose to the bait and produced a barrage of articles questioning the propriety of the board members' behavior.[92] A GAO investigation concluded that there was no impropriety committed by the President's appointees:

"Payments to Board members complied with the law and LSC's regulations and policies,

"LSC's practices for compensating Board members were comparable to those followed by other Government corporations,

"The new LSC president's contract was properly negotiated and consistent with the contracts of past LSC presidents and presidents of other Government corporations, and

"LSC Board members, appointed by the President while the Senate was in recess, were entitled to compensation." [93]

Although the charges were without substance, the damage had been done. The smear campaign had produced a smoke screen behind which LSC's congressional allies could maneuver. LSC continued to receive funding under continuing resolutions that kept the corporation's activities from being closely examined.[94]

Some intimidation was also brought to bear on the Reagan appointees when death threats were made against the board chairman and the corporation's president.[95] Evidently, the pressure tactics worked, for LSC still exists, which is no small accomplishment after three attempts by Reagan to end its financing. The corporation is also prospering; in January 1984, the board of directors voted to request a budget of $325 million for fiscal year 1985, an increase of 18 percent over 1983 and the largest budget the LSC had ever sought.[96] The process was an interesting one: "Board members had planned to seek a 4.4 percent increase, but agreed to increase it after protests last month that the amount was not enough and after accusations that board members were trying to destroy legal aid programs." [97] One would think that the board's first objective should be to dismantle some of LSC's programs, particularly its illegal political, organizing, and training activities. No budget increase would be necessary if the resources devoted to illegal activities were used instead for their intended purpose: providing legal services to the poor.

Despite abundant evidence of blatant wrongdoing, virtually nothing has been done to correct LSC's abuses of its mandate. Congress has placed various restrictions on the corporation's operations from time to time, but it has never effectively brought the organization under control, and no attempts have ever been made to enforce the restrictions. Senator Orrin Hatch has offered an explanation:

"To question the activities of the Corporation and its 326 grantees is, of course, politically disadvantageous. One is led to believe that the nobility of the Corporation's purpose make any question as to the propriety of some of its activities nothing less than a vicious attack on the poor themselves. This misinformed, oversimplified presumption has scared away much needed review and has provided the Corporation with a congressional carte blanche to operate without oversight, without review, and without criticism." [98]

The "apostles of the poor" have carefully cultivated the nation that questioning a program that is intended to help the poor is an attack on the poor. This attitude serves their interests and the interests of those in Congress who benefit from the political activities and the organizing that LSC has so generously funded with taxpayers' money.

LSC and its affiliates do not deal only with political issues, but also with candidates. Those in Congress who support LSC appropriations and do not question how the funds are spend are supported at election time by the grass roots organizations nurtured by LSC. Thus, a cozy relationship has developed between those in Congress who appropriated funds and those who spend them. The taxpayers are the losers, for they finance the grass roots political activity that sends to Congress those individuals who benefit from the illegal use of tax money and who have every incentive to continue this practice. The poor also lose, for funds originally allocated to benefit them are shamelessly diverted for political purposes that primary benefit the "apostles of the poor."

LSC has built a powerful constituency in support of its program and appropriations. One of the most important groups in the coalition is the American Bar Association (ABA), the professional association and lobbying arm of the nation's lawyers. LSC and its affiliates provide direct employment for nearly 5,000 attorneys,[99] and thousands of other attorneys obtain income by participating in LSC lawsuits. If LSC funding were terminated, a depression would hit the legal profession, as thousands of lawyers would be out of work and in competition with other practicing attorneys. There is already a surfeit of lawyers in the U.S., and a steady stream of graduates from the nation's law schools continues to swell the ranks of the profession. Thus, there is a powerful economic rationale for the ABA's interest in LSC's funding; and, according to the Washington Post, the ABA "engaged in a massive lobbying campaign" to protect its stake in the program.[100] In addition to lobbying for LSC, the ABA also responded to the 1980 election of Ronald Reagan by establishing special trust accounts in more than thirty states called "interest on lawyers' trust accounts." [101] In six states the bar associations have made this program mandatory for all lawyers. How it works is that participating lawyers deposit their clients' cash for such things as filing fees and real estate escrows in a statewide account. The interest accrued goes not to the clients but to the Legal Services Corporation. The total contribution was $16 million in 1984 and is expected to be as much as $50 million in 1985.

In thirty of the states this program was set up by the bar associations without legislative approval and in no state does a client have a legal right to say whether he wants the interest to go to the LSC or not. This has enfuriated some clients such as Evelyn Glaeser, an elderly widow who filed suit in Florida federal court claiming her due-process rights were violated when the interest proceeds of a small trust account her husband left her went to the LSC.[102] Mrs. Glaeser's suit was the first in federal courts as of early 1984, although four state courts had, by then ruled the system unconstitutional.

The ABA may also hold this positive view of federal funding for attorneys because the ABA itself has been highly successful in getting tax funds for its own use. Millions of dollars in grants and contracts from numerous federal sources have been given to the ABA for a variety of "studies" (see Appendix Table XII-3). Once a group has its hand in the taxpayers' pocket, it is difficult to be objective about the way in which other organizations dispose of their tax dollars.

Every group that receives funding from government is implicitly threatened whenever efforts are made to eliminate or reduce the funding of even one recipient. For this reason, enormous pressures are brought to bear on politicians whenever spending cuts are contemplated. These pressures are all but irresistible, for individual taxpayers rarely mount a determined resistance to the special interest groups that surround every legislative body. At the very least, however, politicians have an obligation to ensure that public funds are spent only for the purpose for which they were appropriated and to determine if alternative methods of delivering public services exist or can be developed to avoid the abuses that are so common when bureaucracies pursue their own interest at public expense.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, it is time to make a choice. It is a choice between the lawyers and the farmers. It is a choice between litigation and agriculture. It is a choice of whether we are going to set priorities or whether we are going to say we are going to fund every good cause.

I think I have outlined a long list of abuses by Legal Services.

Listening to my colleague and friend from Massachusetts, you would think that he had never heard of the long and honorable history of pro bono legal work by the bar associations around this country.

I wonder why Thomas Jefferson forgot legal services in defining the basic rights of our people.

My point, Mr. President, is that budgets are about choices. Sometimes those choices are hard choices. This is a hard choice. But we are going to vote here in terms of priorities.

I ask those who believe that in this difficult time in agriculture, with a hard transition upon us, money that could fund crop insurance and soil and water conservation is more or less important than funds that have been used and are being used today to stop elections, to fund suits for sex changes, to use universities to stop agricultural research because it might increase productivity, it might be capital intensive, it might put somebody out of a job.

Those are the choices we face. I think that choice is clear. I am going to vote for this amendment as I hope will those who share my concerns about agriculture and those who do not believe the future of America is going to be determined in the courtroom, but think like Jefferson did that it is going to be determined on the farms and ranches of this Nation.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAMM. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the able Senator from Texas.

Mr. President what the Senator from Texas is doing is smoking the fox out of the hen house. He is saying, in his typically gentle way, put up or shut up.

It has been no more than 3 or 4 weeks since this Chamber rang with declarations that "we must do something for the farmers;" "we all love the farmers;" "we must protect the farmers."

All right, this is their chance, is it not, I ask the Senator?

Mr. GRAMM. It certainly is.

Mr. HELMS. I commend the Senator from Texas and am privileged to be a cosponsor of his amendment.

Mr. GRAMM. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, in the last few years the abuses and disclosures regarding the Legal Services Corporation have shocked the Congress and the people. I am advised, however, that in the recent past, in the last 3 or 4 years, there has been a real attempt by those committees of the Congress which had jurisdiction over the operation of the Legal Services Corporation, to sort of clean up the act, to sort of alleviate some of the wrongdoing, and at least the worst abuses have been curtailed.

Mr. President, in view of that, it might seem more or less reasonable to continue the Legal Services Corporation. But when you get right down to it, when you look beyond the representations to the facts, it remains obvious to me that the abuses are still very, very substantial. There are very reasonable nonbudgetary reasons to think that we ought to do away with the Legal Services Corporation. I want to address some of those briefly because I think my friend from Texas has made the case that just purely on budgetary grounds as a matter of priority that, in fact, we could do without this and apply the funds to reducing the deficit or programs of agriculture, or indeed to some other kind of programs.

I do not want the record to be incomplete, win, lose or draw. I do not want the Senate to fail to recognize that there remain significant abuses of the Legal Services Corporation.

In the first place, this notion that what the Legal Services Corporation is doing is funding programs that help people with their day-to-day legal problems—somebody is getting sued on a promissory note or on an obligation or their rights are in question if they are arrested in a criminal action or something—that the Legal Services Corporation rises to the rescue.

I think we all support that kind of help for people who are in trouble. However, according to a report written by the Legal Services Corporation, the Corporation has been involved in redistricting of State legislatures in the following way: In Texas, New Mexico, and Mississippi, Legal Services programs clearly changed the face of Congress and State legislatures through successful lawsuits which overturned their reapportionment plan according to the representation of the Legal Services Corporation.

In other States, such as Colorado and California, redistricting activities have been reported as lobbying the reapportionment committees—lobbying. Now, that is an activity which most of us have presumed to be forbidden under the Legal Services Corporation statute. Yet the report of the Legal Services Corporation represents that that is what they have been doing, at least in part. Thirty-four programs reported handling 94 legislative redistricting cases and expending 2,182 hours and $609,112 in the process.

Mr. President, in addition, many Legal Services Corporation programs either do not maintain or failed to provide detailed information for the report on their activities in redistricting. The following groups used Legal Services funds in nonspecified legislative redistricting activities. The time and money involved in these activities was not reported:

Legal Services Corp. of Alabama; East Arkansas Legal Services; Arkansas Legal Services Support Center; Legal Aid Society of Metropolitan Denver; Legal Services of North Florida; Florida Legal Services; Gulfcoast Legal Services; Land of Lincoln Legal Assistance Foundation; Legal Services Corp. of Northern Indiana; Southwest Louisiana Legal Services Corp.; East Carolina Legal Services; Dakota Plains Legal Services; Virginia Legal Aid Society and Wisconsin Judicare. 13 other programs failed to respond to the survey for this report on their activities.

These recent activities, which I believe are not within the proper scope or charter of a federally funded legal program, are simply the latest in a long history of such activities—not to say that those activities are per se wrong, but that they are improper for a legal foundation or corporation funded by Federal taxpayers.

This goes back a long, long way. Mr. President, the record of that is, I think, on its face, a good reason to be concerned about the existence of the Legal Services Corporation even if we had no budget problem. I am not going to address the budget issues, but I do want to close with this point: The choice is not between giving poor people legal representation and having this Corporation or abolishing the Corporation and letting them do without. There are in this country today over 600,000 private attorneys, approximately twice the number who were in practice at the time the Legal Services Corporation came into existence. They have a long and honorable tradition of pro bono activity, which, in my opinion, could be encouraged and enhanced. At the present time, only 8 percent of the Nation's practicing attorneys are actively engaged in that kind of activity. Even a modest increase in this percentage would more than fulfill any work which would be left undone by abolishing the Legal Services Corporation.

Moreover, Mr. President, I think it is obvious to all of us that when attorneys come forward to do this kind of work because of their professional ethics, because of their commitment to their profession and because of their concern for their fellow human beings, you get a higher standard of performance than when you are just paying them to do it out of somebody's Legal Services Corporation fund.

I do not know about others, but I have learned from my observation of feeding programs, for example, that the Federal programs drive out other programs. When you pay people to do it, you dry up the wellsprings, the sources of private pro bono activity. That is what is happening in legal services as well, apparently.

Mr. President, I rise to endorse the amendment, to congratulate my friend from Texas on taking the lead in this matter. I think it is improbable he will succeed. I think I am skeptical that his amendment is going to pass. Someday it ought to pass; this is the kind of amendment that ought to be raised over and over again and brought to a vote repeatedly until the message sinks in that this program is extravagant, even after the reforms of recent years, and which we can do without. So I thank the Senator for offering it today and I think it ought to be offered again.

Mr. GRAMM. I thank the Senator from Colorado and I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

(Mr. COHEN assumed the chair.)

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I believe the matter of legal services is a State and local responsibility. I do not know of anything under the Constitution that would put that responsibility at the Federal level.

I would say next that the lawyers in the different States and communities will do this work if the Federal Government does not do it.

Mr. President, I spent a large portion of my time when I practiced law helping indigent and poor people. I believe that lawyers today are patriotic enough to help their fellow man if they are in need of services and unable to pay for it. To me, it is as it has just been expressed: if the Federal Government is going to do it, then the lawyers stand aside and will not feel compelled to do it. But I am convinced that they will do it. They have done it in the past; they will do it again if the Federal Government gets out of this field.

The next point I wish to make is this: The question here is a choice between helping the farmers and shifting this money to the farmers or allowing to continue Legal Services. Of the two, should there be any question? There is no segment of our population in this Nation today that is more in need of help than the farmers. In my State today, many have been sold out, gone bankrupt. In other States, the same situation exists. Anything we can do to help them I think we ought to do.

The choice here is very clear: Are you for the farmers when they need help or not? That is the question. I hope the Senate votes in favor of this amendment.

Mr. EXON and Mr. SPECTER addressed the Chair.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask the distinguished Senator controlling the time to yield 5 minutes to me.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, how much time do we have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 6 minutes left.

Mr. CHILES. I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania and 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON].

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support legal services as a program of vital need in this country. When the distinguished Senator from South Carolina says that there is no constitutional requirement for legal services, that may or may not be true, but it is unwise for this body to await a declaration by the Supreme Court of the United States that legal services are constitutionally required. It was not until the decision in Gideon against Wainwright in 1963 that the Supreme Court of the United States said it was mandatory that a lawyer be provided for someone who was hailed into court.

The Congress of the United States could have taken that important step long before it was left to the Supreme Court of the United States to make that ruling as a matter of constitutional mandate. We should not neglect our duty to provide for the public welfare until compelled to do so by the courts. Across this country, Legal Services has performed a very vital function.

I am very much concerned about the problems of the farmer. My State, Pennsylvania, has more people living in the rural part of Pennsylvania, some 2.5 million, than live in the rural part of any other State in this country. I believe that a nation with the wealth of the United States can provide appropriate help for farmers without turning our backs on those who are in need of legal services. Many times, the farmers themselves are in need of legal assistance. When foreclosures have gripped the farming community in this country, it has been necessary on many occasions that they turn to community legal services.

This program has worked very well. It has been substantially reformed. The funding has already been materially reduced. I urge that this body put its stamp of approval on the program of community legal services as it exists today.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Florida. I yield the floor.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I will vote against this amendment because it is an insult to our Nation's farmers.

This amendment is, plain and simple, an effort to destroy the Legal Services Program, which provides vitally needed legal advice to many of our most disadvantaged citizens. Access to legal advice and representation affords these Americans the opportunity to protect their legal rights in the American justice system.

This amendment proposes to transfer money saved by eliminating legal services to agriculture programs. This is a classic smoke-and-mirrors proposal; $300 million does nothing to solve the problems facing our Nation's farmers; $300 million will do nothing to alleviate the desperate plight of Montana ranchers who face foreclosure on the land their grandfathers homesteaded.

This amendment tries to woo support by pretending to benefit agriculture. But I am not fooled, and I oppose the amendment.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I will vote against the Graham amendment to transfer funding for the Legal Services Corporation to the Crop Insurance Program and the Soil Conservation Program. While I support increased funding for these two farming programs, I cannot support this effort to abolish the Legal Services Corporation. There are other ways we can and should provide additional funding for farming programs, and I will be voting for amendments to the budget resolution which do just that.

Mr. President, during the past 4 years the Congress has repeatedly rejected the administration's attempts to abolish the Legal Services Corporation and has reaffirmed its commitment to providing the Nation's poor with legal assistance. Senator GRAHAM, like many others who have advocated abolishing the Corporation, has cited isolated abuses in the legal services program. The Congress has already taken significant steps to curtail the Corporation's activities. If further restrictions are necessary, the Congress should consider responsible legislation which addresses these problems—rather than supporting this effort to do away with the program altogether.

Employees of the Corporation spend most of their time providing legal advice to poor people about such things as housing, divorce, health and domestic violence. As my colleague from Iowa, Senator HARKIN, has so aptly stated, if we vote to abolish the Legal Services Corporation we will be denying the Nation's poor access to the American judicial system and a peaceful way to resolve their disputes.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise in support of this amendment that would rearrange some of our spending priorities. There is little question that America's farmers, particularly those in Iowa, are facing some of the toughest economic times in decades. These troubles spread throughout the fabric of rural communities and affect nonfarm families as well.

As I understand this amendment, the aim is to shift moneys from the budget function that includes legal services to the function that covers agriculture programs. It is important that we remember that the committees of jurisdiction will have the opportunity to shift funds around. Consequently, it is possible that the committees may still be able to retain legal service if they find other sources of savings.

It is my hope that if this is done, that some of the problems with legal services is corrected. In the past, Legal Services Corporation funds have been diverted away from its proper mandate of serving the poor, and instead have been misused for political training, media advocacy, political campaigns and shell corporations.

There are alternative ways of providing legal assistance for the poor. With over 600,000 attorneys in the United States, double the number when Legal Services Corporation was founded, certainly the talent and resources exist that have been untapped to help our Nation's poor.

This amendment boils down to the question of whether more money is needed to cover the needs of America's struggling farmers, or should the other committees with jurisdiction over other programs be required to squeeze more savings out of their programs. I suggest that America's farmers have been squeezed enough and its time that other committees and program administrators be required to be a little more frugal to help out.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, this amendment is a not so thinly veiled attempt to abolish the Legal Services Administration. Because it is cloaked in terms of increased funding for needed agriculture programs, proponents of abolishing legal services for the poor argue that this is an either/or proposition. It is not.

The Reagan administration has attempted to abolish the Legal Services Administration every year it has been in office. Now they are trying to tell the Congress that we have to choose between these two important programs.

Mr. President, this budget process does involve making choices and setting priorities, but not between two specific programs. It involves setting priorities for all Federal spending across the board. My vote for restoring the full Social Security and other cost-of-living adjustments was not a vote against farmers and neither will be my vote to continue funding for Legal Services.

Those who would abolish Legal Services buttress their position by reading us lists of so-called abuses of the program. I have been disturbed by some activities of local legal services offices and have eagerly participated in efforts in Congress to control these excessive activities. I find it interesting, however, that the very people who are hammering away at these isolated abuses of legal services are the ones who are telling us that it is unfair to use examples of waste and abuse in the Pentagon to argue for modifications in the defense budget. I do not think that the isolated abuses in the Pentagon should lead us to abolish the military, nor do I think that isolated abuses in the Legal Services Administration should result in us abandoning our commitment to the provision of legal services for the poor and indigent.

I want it clear that my vote against this amendment bears no relationship to my strong support for both crop insurance and soil and water conservation.

It is not necessary for me to repeat the praises of soil and water conservation. Suffice it to say that our agricultural lands are a limited resource; if we allow them to erode in fiscal year 1986 there will be no land to conserve in fiscal year 1988 or fiscal year 1989. The lesson of Ethiopia is not that far from America. The land is fragile and must be conserved.

However, this is not the place to argue about the importance of these agricultural programs. That is not the real issue being raised by the Senator from Texas.

These are good and necessary programs, and I expect that before this budget process is completed that there will be another opportunity to increase funding for them. And I trust at that time that the cosponsors of this amendment will vote for this augmentation.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am going to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, but not for the reasons that have been stated. I am not convinced that if we eliminate Legal Services, which I have some concerns about, the lawyers are automatically going to take up the slack. Had they taken up the slack, there would not have been any need for Legal Services in the first instance, so I do not think one should be asked to support or vote against the amendment on that ground.

Also, I have noticed, Mr. President, that many people who are defending agriculture today and providing $300 million, which is a pittance, to help the disastrous farm situation in America today, are the same people, by and large, who bought onto the GOP-White House compromise; that after the Budget Committee finished its work, they went right down to the White House and the numbers are almost identical. The people who are now speaking for agriculture do not speak for it, do not vote for it when it really counts. The $18 billion which that compromise took out of the agricultural budget that came out of the Budget Committee shifted to defense. So let us not be fooled, let us not be voting pro or con on this issue on the basis that the lawyers are going to pick up the slack or that it is going to amend the onslaught on agricultural programs by the GOP-White House compromise.

I reserve the remainder of the time and yield it back to the manager of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, we yield back any time that we have remaining.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now occurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] is absent due to illness.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

NOT VOTING—2

East	Long

So Mr. GRAMM's amendment (No. 51) was rejected.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate to my colleagues that, as I understand, there is one additional amendment. There are a number of additional amendments, but I have indicated, if there is another amendment that can be offered now, we will have a vote on this and that will be the last vote of the day.

But I hope that we could do that very quickly. I think it is fairly clear-cut, if it is the one I am thinking of. We will all be happy about it.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I say to the distinguished majority leader I think we will not use much time on our side. We wish to have the vote between 1 p.m. to 1:10 p.m. just to accommodate some Members.

Mr. DOLE. Or even earlier.

Mr. CHILES. Or even earlier.

AMENDMENT NO. 52

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk which I call up and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS], for himself, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. THURMOND, proposes an amendment numbered 52.

At the end of the pending question add the following:

Notwithstanding any other provision of this resolution, the functional totals for the General Government function are reduced by an amount sufficient to allow the reduction of the salaries of Members of Congress by ten per centum.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered on this amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, they have not.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

Let me at the outset ask unanimous consent that in addition to Senator GRASSLEY the names of the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mrs. KASSEBAUM] and the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. NICKLES] be added as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, if ever an amendment needed no lengthy discussion, this is it.

I hear constantly in this Chamber and across the country that the burden of reducing the Federal deficit must be shared by all. This amendment simply provides that the Members of Congress share in that burden to the extent of voting for this amendment, which proposes a 10-percent reduction in the compensation of the Members of Congress.

There is a Latin expression, res ipsa loquitur, meaning the thing speaks for itself, and this amendment speaks for itself.

I feel, Mr. President, that I need say nothing further.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] be listed as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I yield the floor.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my friend and colleague from North Carolina, Senator HELMS, in offering an amendment to reduce the salaries of Members of Congress by 10 percent.

When I first came to Washington as a Member of the House of Representative, I introduced a bill to accomplish this same objective. No action was taken. Again, this year, I introduced a measure to reduce congressional salaries by 10 percent.

The Members of Congress have been very eloquent in the past months urging the reduction of the Federal deficit. One place to begin this reduction process is right here in the Congress itself.

Federal budget deficits have soared in the last 10 years, adding more than $1.5 trillion to the national debt. Since 1974, Congressmen and Senators have received a total of nine pay increases, totaling an additional $30,000 for each legislator in 1984. If our amendment is passed today, a strong message wil be passed to the people of this Nation. We are serious about reducing the Federal deficit, and we are willing to begin here in Washington.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I agree with the sponsors of this amendment that Members of Congress should share in the burden of deficit reduction. However, this amendment is unnecessary in order to achieve that goal because Members of Congress as Federal employees will have their salaries frozen for the coming year. The goal of shared sacrifice is to be fair, not punitive, and should not be exploited for political or partisan gain.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, as far as I know there is no time requested on this side of the aisle on the Helms amendment.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. PRYOR. We yield back the remainder of our time, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] is absent due to illness.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

NOT VOTING—2

Boren	East

So Mr. HELMS' amendment (No. 52) was rejected.

Mr. DOLE. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. HEINZ. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from North Carolina reserved the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question occurs on the motion to table.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, maybe it is not in order, but I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for no more than 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the Chair and I thank the Senator.

I think the Senate ought to think about this vote over the weekend—a 49–49 tie. Here we are, asking everybody to accept cuts. At least this Senator is voting for everything in the package. And we come to the question of our own compensation and end up with a 49–49 tie. I wonder if I might ask the majority leader if it would be possible to have a vote Monday afternoon on the motion to reconsider; if not, a vote Monday afternoon on the vote to table the motion to reconsider. Just carry that over until Monday afternoon. Let Senators think about the implication of what they have done. I may lose by 2 to 1.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I do not see the distinguished minority leader. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DIXON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, the minority leader is off the floor at a caucus on our side, and I reserve the right for him to object.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, let me say I am going to ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to table if we do not delay the consideration of this.

Mr. DIXON. The motion to lay on the table was made by the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HECHT). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURKOWSKI). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. I made a point of order that the motion to reconsider was made by a Senator who does not qualify.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained and the motion falls.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate to my colleagues there will be no more votes today.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now go into executive session to consider the following calendar items: Calendar Nos. 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133 under the Air Force, 134, 135, and 136 under the Army, 137 under the Marine Corps, 138 through 143 under the Navy, and all nominations placed on the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have listened carefully to the calendar numbers that have been read by the distinguished majority leader. We on our side of the aisle have cleared all nominations beginning on page 2 of the calendar beginning with Calendar No. 122 and extending through page 2, through page 3, with the exception of Calendar Order No. 129, through page 4, through page 5, through page 6, through page 7, and through page 8. I am not sure the distinguished majority leader could follow me.

Mr. DOLE. As I understand it, it has been cleared with the exception of Calendar Order 118, 119, 120, 121, and 129.

Mr. BYRD. Yes. We cannot clear at this point any of the nominees on page 1, and we could not clear at this point Calendar Order No. 129 on page 3.

Mr. DOLE. So I would exclude Calendar No. 118, 119, 120, 121, and 129 from my unanimous consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations with those exceptions identified earlier be considered en bloc and confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered and confirmed en bloc.

The nominations confirmed en bloc as follows:

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION

Brig. Gen. Thomas Allen Sands, [redacted], U.S. Army, to be a member and president of the Mississippi River Commission, and Brig. Gen. Robert Joseph Dacey, [redacted], U.S. Army, to be a member of the Mississippi River Commission.

NOMINATION OF JOSEPH H. RODRIGUEZ

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased that we have finally reached the day when the Senate will confirm a highly respected memeber of the New Jersey bar, Joseph Rodriguez, as a member of the Federal judiciary.

Joseph Rodriguez has earned a reputation as an independent, fair, and relentless defender of the law. He has served three separate Governors of New Jersey. In the Republican administration of William Cahill, Mr. Rodriguez was tapped to chair the State Commission of Investigation. And in the current Republican administration of Thomas Kean, he serves as the State's public advocate. The fact that his talents have been so broadly recognized is a tribute to his professionalism.

I have had a deep concern about the quality of our Federal judiciary. These are lifetime appointments. The people we choose will, in large part, determine whether the people have faith in the most basic part of our democracy—the sanctity of our Constitution, the freedoms it grants and the laws that give it strength.

Joseph Rodriguez is highly qualified to fullfill that obligation. As chairman of our State Commission of Investigation he was charged with the responsibility of ensuring the highest ethical standards from our State's public servants. He performed that job with great conviction. Currently Mr. Rodriguez is the people's defender—the person who ensures that the public's rights are not trampled upon. And he has performed that role with equal conviction. These two assignments have called for strict standards and compassion. Both qualities are also essential for a member of the Federal judiciary. In fact the American Bar Association recognized that excellence when, in a very rare action, the unanimously found him "exceptionally well qualified" to be a Federal court judge.

Finally, I would be remiss if I did not note that the appointment of Mr. Rodriguez also broadens the ability of our Federal judiciary to be truly representative of the entire community. I do not know how many other members of the Federal judiciary are of Hispanic descent. In the district which includes New Jersey, the latest census records nearly 7 percent of the population to be of Hispanic origin, and there are no members of the Federal judiciary who are of Hispanic descent. Mr. Rodriguez' appointment will certainly be welcomed by all who would like to see the judiciary more inclusive of the entire community.

I am certain that Joseph Rodriguez will be an outstanding member of the Federal district court in New Jersey and I am very pleased that he will be confirmed today.

NOMINATION OF JOSEPH RODRIGUEZ

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to support the confirmation of Joseph Rodriguez to be a judge on the Federal District Court of the District of New Jersey.

Mr. Rodriguez is a skilled lawyer, an experienced law teacher, and a dedicated public servant. He was deemed exceptionally well qualified by the ABA. He has served as president of the New Jersey State Bar Assciation, chairman of the New Jersey Board of Higher Education, and chairman of the State Commission of Investigation. He teaches trial practice at Rutgers University law school at Camden.

Mr. President, Mr. Rodriguez is more than a skilled lawyer. He is more than an experienced public official. He is a very decent human being. Decency. That should be an essential qualification for a judge. But it is something that is difficult to measure.

One can measure a man by what he does and what people say about him. I had met Joe Rodriguez but I did not know him well until he was proposed by Governor Kean and nominated by President Reagan.

I inquired of many people and groups around the State about Mr. Rodriguez. I heard people tell me he was a decent person. He is universally respected by people who know him across the whole spectrum of New Jersey life. He has been honored by groups as diverse as the ACLU and the American Legion. Just last month, Joe Rodriguez received an award in Sussex County, NJ. It is called the Friend of Hospice Award. It is an award given by a local group to individuals who advance the quality of care and concern for the terminally ill.

Mr. President, people respect Joe Rodriguez' sense of duty. They respect the job he did as chairman of the State Commission on Investigation—charged with rooting out organized crime in our State. And they respect the job he does as public defender—charged with defending indigents accused of crime. And they respect the job he does as public advocate—fulfilling a very broad legislated mandate to pursue the public interest.

Mr. Rodriguez would be the first Hispanic member of the Federal judiciary in New Jersey. I think we must do more, Mr. President, to increase the diversity of the Federal judiciary. By increasing the diversity of the bench with such eminently qualified persons as Mr. Rodriguez, we enhance the respect that the bench commands of the diverse public it must judge.

It should also be noted, Mr. President, that this nomination was sent up last Congress. It failed to reach the floor because of opposition from members of President Reagan's own party. With broad, bipartisan support in New Jersey for Mr. Rodriguez' renomination, the President sent up his name again. Then Mr. Rodriguez was singled out for unusual and, I think, inappropriate scrutiny. He was asked to answer a detailed questionnaire, inquiring of his personal views about abortion, capital punishment, the equal rights amendments and other social issues. Justified questions were raised as to whether the questionnaire reflected an effort to impose an ideological litmus test on judicial nominees.

I think Mr. Rodriguez responded quite appropriately to that questionnaire, and to questions posed to him at a second hearing held by the Judiciary Committee. Mr. Rodriguez attested to his intent to apply the law, the Constitution, and the precedents before him. His personal views, in general, should have no bearing on his fitness to serve. Few judicial candidates are as qualified to sit on the Federal district court as this nominee.

Last, Mr. President, I express my appreciation to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee for moving this nomination forward. While some Senators had delayed action on the nomination, the courts in New Jersey have remained overburdened, hampering the effective administration of justice in my State.

Joseph Rodriguez will bring to the Federal judiciary the same sense of duty, fairness, and decency that he has brought to his previous endeavors. He would be an asset to the bench. I commend him and urge his confirmation by the Senate.

NOMINATION OF SAM B. HALL, JR.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to speak today on behalf of my long time friend, SAM HALL. I am pleased to support Congressman SAM HALL's nomination to the Federal bench. I have known SAM for many years and throughout that time I have had the opportunity to observe his sound thinking, balanced judgment, and wise decisionmaking. Congressman SAM HALL is no stranger to many of the Members of this Chamber. He has served as a member of the House Judiciary Committee, since his first term 9 years ago. As such, many of you have also come to know and respect both the intellectual and academic influence exercised by SAM HALL on the House side.

SAM, like his dad and uncle, will carry on the proud Hall legacy of serving on the bench. Sam Hall, Sr. served as one of Texas's finest judges for more than 20 years. State district judge Hall was respected throughout the State of Texas as an even-handed judge. If SAM's dad were here today, he would be proud of his son's nomination by the President of the United States to the Federal bench.

SAM's dad did get to see many of his son's accomplishments, including SAM's graduation from Baylor Law School. For 27 years, before SAM was elected to his first term in the United States House of Representatives, he practiced law in Marshall, TX. During his tenure in the House of Representatives, he has served on the House Judiciary Committee and has been the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee and has been the chairman of the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Administrative Law and Governmental Relations for the last 2 years.

Congressman SAM HALL, will make the transition to Federal Judge Sam Hall smoothly and I am sure that he will continue to address issues before the bench with the same clarity, ethics, and temperament that has made him my respected friend and colleague. Mr. President, I join with Senate colleagues today in sounding a firm voice of confirmation for SAM HALL, the judicial nominee for the Eastern district of Texas. I would also like to extend my congratulations to SAM's wife, Madeleine, and their three daughters.

NOMINATION OF JOSEPH RODRIGUEZ

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, the Senate is today doing the people of my neighboring State of New Jersey a great service by approving the nomination of Joseph Rodriguez to be a Federal district judge.

My distinguished colleagues, Senators BRADLEY and LAUTENBERG, have worked steadily for months to move this nomination along, and I have joined them in that effort.

Mr. Rodriguez is, without question, among the most highly qualified judicial nominees the Senate Judiciary Committee has considered, as indicated by his American Bar Association rating of "unanimously exceptionally well qualified," the highest rating given by the ABA, and given only rarely.

Mr. Rodriguez has held an extraordinary array of positions in the service of the public under Democratic and Republican Governors alike. In the Republican administration of William Cahill he was chairman of the State Board of Higher Education; under Democrat Brendon Byrne he was chairman of the State Commission of Investigation; and in the current Republican administration of Thomas Kean, Mr. Rodriguez is the States public advocate and public defender.

Mr. Rodriguez also spent over 20 years in private law practice, which, along with his service as public defender, gives him an unusually comprehensive record of experience in both criminal and civil law.

An additional reason that this nomination is important to the State of New Jersey is that nearly 7 percent of that State is of Hispanic origin. Mr. Rodriguez will be the first Hispanic on the Federal bench in New Jersey. His confirmation is an important step toward making the Federal judiciary more representative of the community.

Mr. Rodriguez demonstrated his good judgment by the manner in which he answered questions proffered to him by some members of the Judiciary Committee concerning his views on various Supreme Court decisions. Mr. Rodriguez declined to pass judgment upon those Supreme Court decisions, stating that to do so would mean that he "would be unable to impartially determine a similar issue that might be presented at a future time," and noting that to answer such questions would also create an "appearance of impropriety."

In conclusion, I believe that Joseph Rodriguez possesses the legal experience, competence, integrity, and judicial temperament to serve with distinction on the Federal bench. I commend Mr. Rodriguez to my colleagues.

TRIBUTE TO GENERAL ROGERS

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, as the Senate acts today on General Rogers' nomination, I want to pay special tribute to the exemplary service he has rendered as the Supreme Allied Commander in Europe [SACEUR]. To enumerate General Rogers' many accomplishments as SACEUR would take quite some time, so I will just mention a few:

He provided firm leadership in helping to steer the alliance through the difficult challenges of implementing the dual-track INF decision;

He has time and time again drawn public and governmental attention to the relationship between the height of the nuclear threshold and the state of NATO's conventional defenses;

He took the initiative in defining and formalizing the "Follow-On Forces Attack" doctrine;

He gained the respect and confidence of our allies in dealing with a number of sensitive policy issues, including facilitating Spain's entry into the alliance and trying to resolve the disagreements between our allies on the southern flank;

He has worked tirelessly for a number of years to try to improve NATO's conventional defense capabilities and, in recent months, has helped ensure that my concerns in this area are being met by a much more receptive audience in Europe.

Mr. President, I would also mention that in marked contrast to other military and civilian defense officials who have testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee over the years, General Rogers has always been forthright and candid in his assessments. He has never hesitated to call things as he sees them, pointing out what is wrong and what needs to be fixed.

General Rogers' reappointment as SACEUR, together with the impressive skills which Ambassador Abshire and Lord Carrington have brought to Brussels, will ensure that a leadership team will remain in place in NATO that can continue to advance the alliance toward our common goals. I commend President Reagan for his decision to reappoint General Rogers to this critical position.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nominations were confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immedately notified that the Senate has given its consent to these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond 2 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. EAGLETON:

S. 1067. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to establish an improved system for providing military advice to the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of Defense, to establish a National Military Advisory Council, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

REFORMING THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to address and remedy one of the most serious problems plaguing our national defense: the performance of the Joint Chiefs of Staff [JCS]. The bill is identical to the amendment I offered last June to the Defense Authorization Act.

Following the productive debate on my amendment last summer, I agreed to withdraw it with the understanding that a staff report on reform would be soon completed and that the issue would receive expeditious treatment in the Armed Services Committee during the remaining months of the 98th Congress.

I was disappointed that at the end of the 98th Congress no report had been issued and no action had been taken by the committee. By introducing my legislation again today I hope to refocus the attention of the Senate on the issue.

JCS reform is far too important to our Nation's security to be ignored during the time remaining in this session of Congress. Dissatisfaction with Defense Department management and the widespread concern about the budget deficit make the issue ripe for action. Congress must act with forethought but also with a sense of urgency to redress this serious flaw in the U.S. defense structure.

I do not pretend to have discovered this problem, nor do I claim to be alone today in calling for reorganization; quite the contrary. As R. James Woolsey, former Under Secretary of the Navy has written, "The weakness and lack of influence of the Joint Chiefs is one of the Pentagon's less well-kept secrets."

Problems and criticisms date back to the original compromise creating the Joint Chiefs of Staff in 1947. The organization has been the subject of an almost endless series of critical studies conducted by blue-ribbon panels inside and outside DOD—21 in the last 36 years. The latest study, which was released 2 months ago by the Defense Organization Project at Georgetown University's Center for Strategic and International Studies [CSIS], has given JCS reform efforts tremendous momentum.

The CSIS study, entitled "Toward a More Effective Defense," was developed by 70 individuals with experience at the highest levels of the Defense Establishment, including retired senior military and civilian officials, industry executives, and Members of Congress—Senators COHEN, EXON, KASSEBAUM, and NUNN and a number of House Members from both parties. The study was endorsed by six former Secretaries of Defense—Brown, Clifford, Laird, McNamara, Richardson, and Schlesinger—who wrote:

> There are serious deficiencies in the organization and managerial procedures of the defense establishment * * * we are able to testify about the degree to which they weaken efforts to ensure U.S. security.

In its "Joint Military Structures" chapter, the CSIS study quickly put its finger on the most fundamental, inescapable flaw in the current JCS structure:

> Each member of the JCS, except the chairman, faces an inherent conflict between his joint role on the one hand and his responsibility to represent the interests of his service on the other. As the senior military planning and advisory body, the JCS are charged with providing military advice that transcends individual service concerns. At the same time, each chief is the military leader of his service and its primary spokesman to the civilian leadership. Although the 1947 National Security Act mandates that a service chief's joint role should take precedence over his duties as leader of a service, this does not occur in practice—and for good reason. If a chief did not defend service positions in the joint forum, he would lose the support and loyalty of his service, thus destroying his effectiveness.

The CSIS study agrees with its predecessors: The Chiefs' understandable and admirable commitment to the respective services which they lead make it impossible for the Chiefs to set aside their service perspectives to effectively discharge their joint responsibilities. In other words, the present system creates an unavoidable conflict of interest for each service Chief.

The tradition that JCS advice be unanimous—with each service able to exercise veto power—reduces that advice to negotiated pabulum, rather than the crisp, well-reasoned assessment of the problems and options which the Secretary of Defense and the President are entitled to expect from their principal military advisers.

John Kester, Secretary Brown's Special Assistant and Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Army during the Nixon administration, made this firsthand observation on the subject:

> When I worked in the Secretary of Defense's Office, I was suprised that memoranda from the JCS were not the crisp assessments of situations and options one might expect. They more closely resembled the contract for sale of your house, with numbered lines and carefully drafted circumlocutions designed to protect bureaucratic interests and conceal compromises.

Gen. David Jones, former Chairman of the JCS and a participant in the CSIS study, whose willingness to criticize the Joint Chiefs sparked new interest in the issue, had the same experience:

> When the Chairman or the other members of the Joint Chiefs gave their own personal advice, it was given high marks. But when it became corporate advice, of five people together, it was of very little use, not very influential, and given very poor marks by the customers, the civilian leadership, as well as the senior military officials.

The organizational failing of the JCS leave our defense effort with a profound vacuum at the top where joint strategy, contingency planning, and budgeting and allocation of resources are involved. In this regard, the distinguished retired Gen. Andrew J. Goodpaster has testified:

> Although the JCS bear only part of the responsibility (for the lack of) a coherent, effective defense policy, military strategy and military posture * * * they bear an important part * * *
> The contributions to increased military efficiency and effectiveness that could be made through improved top-level military planning and advice are not being realized. In particular, the mechanisms for developing and advancing individual service interests and promoting individuals weapons systems are stronger by far than those for providing coherent overall strategic plans and responding to overall national security interests and needs * * *

Perhaps one of the most visible adverse consequences of the current organization is with respect to the bloated defense budget. We know all too well that the military is not making the hard choices between weapons which effective joint leadership could help to produce. Former Defense Secretary James Schlesinger commented on this subject during a recent call to reorganize the JCS:

The general rule is that no service ox may be gored * * * The unavoidable outcome is a structure in which logrolling, backscratching, marriage agreements and the like flourish * * *

What comes up from the Joint Chiefs is a mutual endorsement of the individual desire of the several services. There is no crosscutting—nor, given the nature of the structure, can there be any crosscutting. As I generally have been a supporter of the top dollar for the military services, I believe I can say that the dollar requests are invariably so high that they cannot conceivably be sustained by the national consensus.

The ineffectiveness of the present JCS system has also left its dirty fingerprints on U.S. military operations. According to Dr. Schlesinger, "The existing structure does impede planning, for each of the services quite naturally wishes a piece of the action in any crisis—and the existing structure assures that all somehow will be fitted in, even if a service provides less than optimal forces for dealing with that particular crisis."

Robert Komer, Ambassador and former Under Secretary of Defense, has provided a specific example:

I was unable to get a corporate view from the JCS on the optimum strategy for deterrence and defense in the Persian Gulf.

That doesn't mean that each of the Chiefs didn't have some clear ideas on what to do. Some of them emphasized a maritime strategy. Some of them emphasized victory through air power. Others emphasized sending a lot of divisions. But there was no way which would permit them to give meaningful military advice to the Secretary of Defense institutionally as to how best to defend Persian Gulf Oil.

Experience teaches what logic would suggest: The weaknesses resulting form the lack of an effective joint mechanism—and the dangers inherent in the "something for every service" approach—do not disappear when actual combat situations occur. Instead, they are exacerbated. Consider the following:

The Vietnam War: According to former JCS Chairman Jones, "The organizational arrangements were a nightmare; for example, each service fought its own air war."

The Iranian hostage rescue attempt: Air Force helicopter pilots, who had flown in Vietnam and were specially trained for hazardous overland missions, were passed over in favor of Marine pilots who were clearly less qualified. The overriding consideration was, apparently, ensuring that the marines would have some role to play in the important mission.

The tragedy at the Marine compound in Beirut. Marines found themselves at the bottom of an unwieldy chain of command headed by an Army general, then an Air Force general, and then four levels of Navy officers. The Defense Department's own Long Commission reported apparent and understandable confusion about who actually was the senior commander of the U.S. multinational force in Lebanon. The Navy commander of the amphibious task force was the "Commander, U.S. Forces Lebanon." The Marine commander of the Amphibous task force was the "Commander, U.S. Forces Ashore Lebanon." The Commission sharply criticized the entire chain of command for not "initiating actions to effectively insure the security" of the Marine compound.

Even beyond the fundamental problem of conflict of interest which arises from "dual hatting," the time demands placed on the Chiefs are unreasonable. Leading one of the armed services is a more than full-time responsibility by itself, without the distraction of joint responsibilities. Inevitably, the need to play two roles can undermine the performance of one or the other—or both. General Jones has observed:

Omar Bradley once said he didn't have time to do both jobs well * * * Things are much more complex now than they were in his time * * * It is very difficult to have enough time to immerse oneself deeply into joint issues and to do the job as the Chief of a service.

The recent CSIS report concludes that many of the problems I have outlined could be alleviated by designating "the Chairman as the principal military adviser to the President, the Secretary of Defense, and the National Security Council, replacing the corporate JCS in that role." My legislation incorporates this recommendation by designating a Chief of Military Staff to take the place of the corporate JCS and to serve as the principal adviser to the civilian leadership.

The legislation I will offer would incorporate another CSIS recommendation by creating a Deputy Chief of Military Staff to assist the Chief with day-to-day activities and the management of crisis situations. At present, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs is the only senior executive—civilian or military—in the Defense Department without a deputy.

The conflict of interest problem that afflicts the JCS is reflected in the workings of the Joint Staff, which provides support for the Joint Chiefs. The CSIS study notes:

The officers who serve on the Joint Staff have strong incentives to protect the interests of their services in the joint arena. Joint Staff officers usually serve only a single tour there, and must look to their parent service for promotions and future assignments. Their performance is judged in large part by how effectively they have represented service interests.

Because the interests of each service take precedent over the joint interests generally, and because duty with the JCS is not a respected assignment, the quality of the Joint Staff suffers. Indeed, many experts have observed that the services are unwilling to assign their best officers to joint service, and as John Kester has noted, "talented officers approach service on the Joint Staff with the same enthusiasm of sailors ordered to chip paint."

CSIS recommends a number of changes in the Joint Staff system "so that officers are attracted to, trained for, and rewarded for service in joint positions." Again, I believe that my legislation offers a solution that incorporates the CSIS recommendation.

There is no single "magic bullet" that will solve all our defense problems overnight, but I am convinced that fundamental change of the JCS is as important as any single step we could take. I am hopeful that the results of the CSIS report and the increased awareness in Congress and in the public of the need for military reform will prod Congress to make necessary reforms in the near future.

The legislation I will introduce would do the following:

It would abolish the JCS, replacing the corporate entity with a single Chief of Military Staff who would serve as the principal military adviser to the President, Congress, the Secretary of Defense, and the National Security Council.

It would create a Deputy Chief of Military Staff, also to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. If the Chief came from the Army or the Air Force, the Deputy would come from the Navy or the Marines, or vice versa.

It would establish a National Military Advisory Council [NMAC], comprised of four officers drawn from the respective services, to advise the Chief of Military Staff. Unlike the present situation, however, the members of the NMAC would be the last tour of duty for particularly distinguished, senior military officers who would not be returning to their services (except in cases of necessity during a declared war). In this way, hopefully, the Chief of Military Staff could get the advice of senior officers of unquestioned stature who would be in a position to consider our overall defense picture, rather than the interests of a particular service.

Service on the Joint Staff would be upgraded in several ways. The legislation specifies that the Secretaries of the services should recommend only outstanding officers for joint service. To underscore the importance of the assignment, the legislation would give the the Chief of Military Staff the authority to select up to 100 others who were not recommended by the services. Special provisions are made to ensure that service of the joint military staff will be accorded substantial weight in considering promotions. If the Chief of Military Staff requested, a selection board to consider promotions for officers of the Joint Staff, at the same time that the selection boards were considering promotions for those officers in individual services, and a percentage of the vacancies would be set aside for officers being considered by the special board.

Those who favor serious reform of the JCS have fallen into one of two camps. My amendment represents one school of thought which argues that because the conflict of interest arising from "dual hatting" is the essence of the problem, we should remove the service Chiefs from their joint responsibilities. Many noted defense experts—civilian and military—have endorsed this view, including Harold Brown, Gen. "Shy" Meyer, Gen. Maxwell Taylor, and David Packer. Others, seeing the same problem, argue that reform would be more realistic—and encounter less resistance—if the Chiefs retained their position on the JCS, while the Chairman's role was significantly strengthened.

Although the two groups favoring reform diverge on the proper role for the service Chiefs, a clear consensus exists about major elements of a reform package: making one officer the principal military adviser to the President, the Secretary of Defense, and the NSC; allowing that office to direct the activities of a strengthened Joint Staff, with incentives to make joint service more attractive; and creating a 4-star Deputy Chief to assist the chief military officer.

HOUSE LEGISLATION

During the 98th Congress, the House approved legislation making certain changes in the JCS structure and last summer added the bill's language to the fiscal year 1985 Defense Authorization Act. The controversial House language was dropped in conference.

The House may well act on similar JCS reform legislation during the current Congress and I am hopeful that the Senate will offer a different version. This expected activity presents the Congress with an opportunity, but also a danger. Not since 1958 has Congress focussed seriously on the issue of JCS.

Realistically, once we legislate, any changes made are likely to stay in effect for years. For that reason, reform must be accomplished soon, but it must be done right, through legislation which will stand the test of time. Accordingly, I would like to take a few moments to critique last year's House-passed reform bill.

While I admire the leadership of the House committee on this issue, I believe that the House legislation did too little and too much at the same time.

It did too little in just those areas where a consensus on the need for reform seems to have emerged: The legislation did not create a Deputy Chairman; it did not give the Chairman the sole authority for directing the activities of the Joint Staff; it did not explicitly make the Chairman the principal military adviser to the President, the Secretary of Defense, and the NSC.

At the same time, the House legislation went too far by straying into two sensitive and dangerous areas. The House would have made the Chairman of the JCS a member of the NSC. It also would have placed the Chairman, by statute, in the chain of command, specifying that orders to combat commands shall be issued by the President or the Secretary through the Chairman.

These are far-reaching changes. Under current law, the Joint Chiefs have staff, not command, duties. "Their function," President Eisenhower reminded Congress, "is to advise and assist the Secretary of Defense."

By placing the Chairman on the NSC, the House bill made him a coequal with the Secretary of Defense—not his foremost military adviser. John Kester, who has given these issues as much thought as anyone, has predicted these regulations.

> It gives the Chairman another hat, as they say in the military. It gives him a statutory office which is not derivative from the Secretary of Defense. It takes little foresight to predict that some day, if only because of the relentless pressure of his subordinates (who are not malevolent, but simply behave like any other official's subordinates), the Chairman will have a staff to assist him in preparing for his participation in the National Security Council, and for developing his NSC position.
> * * * such a separate role would encourage barriers (there are already enough of them at the staff level) between the Chairman and the Secretary of Defense. When queried by the Secretary of Defense, or more likely by one of the Secretary of Defense's staff such as the Undersecretary for Policy, the Chairman's staff will politely reply what the Chairman does in his role as an NSC member is independent, and is none of the Secretary's business. It is already difficult enough to get the rest of the government to understand that the JCS is part of the Defense Department and that the Chairman by law does work for the Secretary of Defense. No legislation is needed to enhance the problem.
> This totally unnecessary addition of role (unnecessary because the Chairman is in attendance and available at all NSC meetings anyway), can do nothing but work mischief. No coherent argument in support of such a change has been advanced; the best thing that proponents say for it is that it may be harmless. That is no basis on which to alter one of the most important and delicate organizational balances in our government.

Placing the Chairman in the chain of command represents an even more fundamental change. The House would have amended the long-standing law that prohibits the Chairman from commanding the Armed Forces. The legislation inserts the Chairman into the chain of command between the Secretary of Defense and the nine worldwide commanders. Every order from the President and the Secretary of Defense would have to go through the Chairman. The Defense Department's counsel to the Congress stated that the legislation would "vest him with supreme military command in his own right" as a single military leader of all American combat units.

Harold Brown has testified to the Senate Armed Services Committee about his misgivings about putting the Chairman in the chain of command: that it is unnecessary and simply invites others to circumvent the Secretary of Defense.

In my view, the House legislation was the wrong way to go. The dangerous departures outweigh the worthwhile reforms by a considerable margin. But the flaws in the House legislation do not change the fact that JCS reform is desperately needed. Both my bill and the reform proposals of the highly respected CSIS study demonstrate that meaningful reform can be accomplished—and should be accomplished—without shifting the country's chief military officer from an advisory position to a command position.

That the House is likely to act on similar legislation this year should be ample incentive for the Senate to push ahead with a more reasonable approach to JCS reorganization.

OPPOSITION TO REFORM

One last point. There is a stubborn group of individuals who oppose any JCS reform. Their fear of change too often seems to result from parochial "turf" interests rather than national defense interests. Nonetheless, opponents have raised legitimate questions about reform proposals such as that which was passed in the House last year.

One of the leading opponents has been the Secretary of the Navy, John Lehman, who has aptly criticized the House JCS legislation but has inaccurately equated JCS reorganization with the specter of a German-style general staff, which would threaten the very foundations of civilian control of the military.

This is an old argument and in my judgment a red herring. Obviously, in any reform we undertake we must be vigilant about maintaining the tradition of civilian control of the military, which is essential to the way our democracy—and any democracy—functions. I opposed the House legislation because I believe it tampers excessively with the civilian-military balance.

But I think that the issue—like so many that we face in Congress—is one of trying to strike a realistic balance—and not being afraid to make needed changes because of a worst-case, doomsday scenario. We have a serious problem, amply documented over the decades; the service interests have prevailed over the joint interests and prevented coherent budgeting, planning, and operations for the overall defense needs of this country. The quality of military advice to the Secretary of Defense, the NSC, and the President is not what it should be. That is the reality with which we must deal.

General Jones has pointed out that the British, after whom we modeled our JCS, have recently moved to strengthen their Chief of Defense Staff to enhance effective integration of their defense capabilities—"secure in the knowledge that their democratic traditions will not be threatened." Other experts have noted that since 1947, many power centers in our Government have developed to hold any military staff in check: The Assistant Secretaries of Defense, the State Department, the Arms Control Agency, the staff of the National Security Adviser, and the CIA. With these realities in mind, Harold Brown has described the fear that JCS reorganization would produce "something analogous to a German general staff * * * as completely baseless." Or as James Woolsey, former Undersecretary of the Navy, has written more graphically:

> We can afford to move several light years toward military staff centralization before we come within any distance of Prussianism. The United States is about as close to having a Prussian style general staff today as it is to having a dictatorship of the proletariat.

Secretary Lehman is entitled to his view that JCS reform "is usually pushed by a coalition of civilian arm chair strategists, who don't really understand the Pentagon bureaucracy, and by uniformed military staff officers, who understand it too well." Into the first category, Secretary Lehman would apparently put: Harold Brown, James Schlesinger, David Packard, Elliot Richardson, Mel Laird, Robert Komer, Clark Clifford, Robert McNamara, Stuart Symington, Roswell Gilpatric, James Woolsey, John Kester, and Brent Scowcroft. Into Secretary Lehman's second category would fall the following generals: David Jones, "Shy" Meyer, Andrew Goodpaster, Maxwell Taylor, James Gavin, Omar Bradley, and Dwight D. Eisenhower. All these men have identified themselves with the cause of JCS reform. I have been persuaded by their collective wisdom and thoroughly unconvinced by the weak arguments of those opposed to reform.

I urge detractors of reform to focus their arguments on the weak points of bills such as the one passed by the House of Representatives last year and not on the concept of reorganization itself.

As our recently retired colleague Senator Tower said during the JCS debate last summer, "There are a number of us who have recognized for some time the need for reform. The great difficulty is trying to agree on what form reform should take." The challenge before us is enormous, but it is not insurmountable.

Mr. President, the bill I introduce today may not be the perfect solution. But it is long past time that we commit ourselves to a serious debate about the weaknesses that are almost universally diagnosed and perceived to be extremely detrimental to the defense of this Nation. This legislation is a start—hopefully a catalyst—for forceful efforts to find the right answer.

I ask that the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1067

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

(1) under the current law, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are the principal military advisers to the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of Defense;

(2) since the creation of the Joint Chiefs of Staff a number of studies by so-called blue-ribbon commissions have found serious defects in the organizational structure of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; and

(3) in order to ensure that the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of Defense receive the best possible military advice, it is imperative that major organizational changes be made in the present system of providing such advice.

By Mr. JOHNSTON (for himself and Mr. MCCLURE):

S. 1068. A bill to eliminate unnecessary paperwork and reporting requirements contained in section 15(1) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, and sections 601 and 606 of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act Amendment of 1978; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

REPEAL OF CERTAIN OCS REPORTING REQUIREMENTS

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, much has been said in recent years about curbing waste in the Federal Government. While lots of examples have been put forth, frequently what is waste to one Member is a vital program for another. It is unusual to find an undisputed case of waste that can be easily curbed. Therefore, I am pleased to introduce today, with Senator MCCLURE, a bill today that repeals an anachronistic reporting requirement that is wasting valuable resources of the Department of the Interior, the General Accounting Office, and the oil industry. The savings here are not earthshaking, but on the other hand they are real savings.

This bill accomplishes two objectives. First, it repeals provisions in the OCS Lands Act and in the OCS Lands Act Amendments of 1978 that require reports by the Secretary of the Interior and the Comptroller General on OCS oil and gas wells that are shut in; that is, not being produced and natural gas wells that are being flared; that is, the gas is being vented to the atmosphere insead of being collected for pipelines.

Second, this bill repeals a provision that requires the Secretary of Interior to maintain a "continuing investigation" on the availability of oil and gas on the OCS, a matter that the Department of Interior will study and investigate in any event. The reason for deleting this requirement stems, as I will explain, from the manner in which this study is required to be carried out.

As to the first objective, the bill repeals section 15(1)(D) of the OCS Lands Act that requires the Department of Interior to include in its annual report on leasing and production on the OCS "a list of all shut-in and flaring wells." In addition the bill repeals section 601 and section 606 of the OCS Lands Act Amendments of 1978. Section 601 requires the Secretary of the Interior to provide an annual report to the Comptroller General on shut-in and flaring of oil and gas wells on the OCS. It also requires the Secretary to indicate in his report why each such well is shut in or flared and whether with respect to each such well the Secretary will order its production or the cessation of flaring, as the case may be. Finally, section 601 requires the Comptroller General to review and evaluate the methodology which the Secretary used in deciding whether or not to require production of the well or the cessation of flaring.

These particular reporting requirements on shut-in wells and flaring of wells on the OCS are unnecessary for two reasons. First, the General Accounting Office, who has studied this matter for 6 consecutive years, believes that they are unnecessary. Their sixth and latest report—October 30, 1984—stated:

> Our last four reports questioned the usefulness of Interior's annual report on shut-in and flaring wells. In each of the reports, we recommended that the Congress repeal section 15(1)(D) of the Outer Continental Shelf (OCS) Lands Act, as amended, and sections 601(a) and (b) of the OCS Lands Act Amendments of 1978 . . . We continue to support this recommendation. Staff of oversight committees in both the Senate and the House told us that congressional interest in Interior's annual report does not warrant further reporting. Eliminating Interior's reporting requirement would not diminish Interior's responsibility to oversee OCS lease activities to assure efficient development of oil and gas resources and compliance with applicable laws, regulations, and lease agreements. We believe that Interior is effectively monitoring OCS shut-in and flaring well activity and Interior has stated that it will continue to do so even if the annual reporting requirement is repealed.

Second, these reporting requirements are unnecessary because the rationale for shutting in OCS wells or flaring valuable gas from such wells has disappeared, if a rationale ever existed at all. We have neither an oil or gas shortage, nor price and allocation controls on oil. Gas controls are limited. Who would incur the enormous capital cost to develop a productive, economically viable well on the OCS and then deliberately shut it in?

The second overall objective of this legislation is to repeal the provision—section 606—that required the Department of Interior to conduct a continuing investigation of the availability of oil and gas on the OCS. This investigation must include a determination of the maximum rate of production [MAR] of significant oil and gas fields on the OCS and whether actual production has been less than the MAR and why.

In a report to the Congress dated September 10, 1982, the General Accounting Office noted that the Department of Interior monitors and collects three types of OCS production rates, including the MAR. The GAO said, "The third rate, the MAR, is not providing any useful data." In addition they found that no one is using the MAR report and moreover that the shortcomings of the MAR data are such that "* * * the MAR's are not a valid basis for the Congress to use in determining OCS production available to meet supply emergencies." The GAO report to Congress concluded, "We recommend that the Congress repeal section 606 of the OCS Land Act Amendments of 1978 (43 U.S.C. 1865) to eliminate the data gathering and reporting requirements related to the MAR rates."

Section 606 also requires that this "continuing investigation" include an estimate of discovered and undiscovered crude oil and gas reserves on the OCS, the "relationship" of all this information collected under section 606 to requirements of conservation, industry, commerce, and national defense, and an independent evaluation of trade association procedures for estimating OCS reserves. Certainly, the Department of Interior will continue to assemble estimates of OCS oil and gas reserves to any event. The relationship of such information to requirements of "conservation, industry, commerce, and national defense" is well established by now. Finally, the requirement that the Comptroller General continue making an independent evaluation of trade association procedures for estimating OCS reserves is at this point simply unnecessary.

The costs to the Department of the Interior, the General Accounting Office, and the industry which would be eliminated by this bill are in fact small, relative to the numbers we are accustomed to using here on the Senate floor. But the fact is that these costs need not be incurred. The GAO asked seven oil companies what their costs of compliance are with respect to reporting on OCS production rates. In their report to Congress of September 10, 1982, GAO indicated that these seven firms alone spent $426,500 yearly in assembling data for the necessary reports, although the figures are too precise and they combine the costs of all three OCS production rates collected by Interior, not just the costs associated with the MAR.

The GAO has most recently estimated that preparation of the shut-in and flaring well report costs the Department of the Interior and the GAO a total of about $45,000 per year with the GAO spending $29,000 of that figure. Moreover, the GAO reported in 1982, that the Department of Interior spent $84,400 per year in collecting and reporting just the MAR data for the report required by section 606 of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act Amendments.

So the annual savings from this bill, if enacted, are measured in the hundreds of thousands, not millions, of dollars. But given the absence of any rationale for continuing these mandated reports, these savings would appear to be reason enough to enact this legislation.

On April 4, 1985, Representative JONES and 10 cosponsors introduced a House companion bill, H.R. 1983.●

By Mr. LEAHY:

S. 1069. A bill to amend the Agricultural Act of 1949 to modify the Dairy Price Support Program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

DAIRY PROGRAM IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, today I am introducing dairy legislation which will provide a long-term, enduring program which will not invite or require year to year adjustments by Congress.

The dairy farmers of this country deserve a program which will allow realistic planning.

I believe that my legislation protects the family farmers of this country by ensuring that they do not have to operate under unpredictable and unrealistic programs.

From my meetings at home with Vermont dairy farmers, I know that they are sensitive to large Government purchases and rising Government costs. They are aware of the dangers of an overly generous price support program which encourages Government purchases.

At the same time, they want stability in the dairy industry and recognize the contribution of the purchase program to that stability over the years. They will not support a price cut which will drive many of the family farmers of this Nation out of business. They will accept a program which will provide an orderly transition to a market clearing system.

The legislation I am introducing today maintains dairy price supports at a reasonable level. For that period, October 1, 1985, through September 30, 1987, dairy price supports would be maintained at the level set by the Secretary on July 1, 1985. On October 1, 1987, dairy price supports would be set according to a supply-demand adjuster and a cost of production index. The supply-demand adjuster would provide specific discretionary authority to the Secretary to raise or lower price supports based on the level of Government purchases. The cost of production index would replace the present parity index which is recognized as an outdated standard.

I realize that my legislation will not satisfy the many diverse interests in this country. However, it does treat those many interests equitably. It is a program which will allow the dairy industry in this country to move forward with some certainty.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to take a close look at the bill and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1069

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Dairy Program Improvement Act of 1985".

MILK PRICE SUPPORT

SEC. 2. Subsection (d) of section 201 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1446(d)) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of law—

"(1) Effective for the fiscal years beginning October 1, 1985, and October 1, 1986, the price of milk shall be supported at the same level that was in effect on July 1, 1985.

"(2) Effective for the fiscal years beginning October 1, 1987, and October 1, 1988, the price of milk shall be supported at a level determined in accordance with this paragraph.

"(A) The Secretary shall compute annually an index of items for each fiscal year as provided in this paragraph that affected the cost of producing milk or the products of milk during the period from calendar year 1976 through calendar year 1978. The Secretary shall compute the index taking into account the following schedule of items and the proportional contribution of each item:

Item	Contribution to the Index
Consumer Price Index	10 per centum
Prices received by farmers for meat animals	10 per centum
Feed costs	33 per centum
Interest paid by farmers	8 per centum
Taxes	2.5 per centum
Fuel and energy expenses	4 per centum
Milk hauling costs	3 per centum
Machinery and building repair expenses	4 per centum
Hired labor expenses	7 per centum
Farm services and general overhead costs	8.5 per centum

The Secretary shall use the value of the index so computed to measure changes in the cost of producing milk or the products of milk during the most recent six-month period.

"(B) The index computed under this paragraph shall be further adjusted to reflect increases in productivity, taking into account such factors as changes in milk produced per cow, and other related factors the Secretary determines to be relevant.

"(C) The adjusted value of the index shall be multiplied by $8.33 to determine the support price per hundredweight for milk containing 3.67 per centum of milkfat on October 1, 1987.

"(D) The Secretary shall estimate Government price support purchases (not of sales for unrestricted use) for each such fiscal year using the amount of such purchases made during the most recent six-month period adjusted to an annual level. If the Secretary estimates that the Government price support purchases of milk or the products of milk will be less than 5 billion pounds or in excess of 5.990 billion pounds milk equivalent, the Secretary shall adjust the price support as determined in this paragraph according to the following table:

"If the estimated amount (in billions of pounds) of net Government price support purchases of milk during the relevant period is (in milk equivalent):	The percentage of price support level per hundredweight for milk shall be:
Less than 3	104
3.0 to 3.99	103
4.0 to 4.99	102
5.0 to 5.99	100
6.0 to 6.99	98
7.0 to 7.99	96

"(3) The price of milk shall be supported through the purchase of milk and the products of milk."

S. 1070. A bill to provide a Congressional Medal of Honor to John Yancey; to the Committee on Armed Services.

CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL OF HONOR TO JOHN YANCEY

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am pleased today to join my fellow Arkansans and others in the country who have long recognized the heroic efforts of John Yancey, familiarly known as "Cap'n John" and a citizen of Little Rock. His name, and his story, are both worth the attention of my colleagues in the Senate.

John Yancey has been described as "the iron marine" because of repeated acts of heroism in both World War II and the Korean conflict. As a first lieutenant in the Marines he earned a Navy Cross when he and a handful of his men took a strategic jungle on Guadalcanal in November 1942. He had enlisted in the Marines on December 8, 1941, the day after the attack on Pearl Harbor.

In November 1950 John Yancey displayed again the heroism that distinguishes his character while commanding a platoon of Company E, 2d Battalion, 7th Marines, 1st Marine Division. With all his superior officers killed, he led the remnants of several platoons against an enemy onslaught. At the time he was 32 years old and had suffered three serious head wounds in previous fighting.

This incident occurred, Mr. President, during the battle of the Chosin Reservoir in North Korea, a siege that has become known as one of the bloodiest and costliest in the entire war. It pitted some 15,000 allied troops against an estimated 120,000 Chinese Communist troops in subzero weather.

Nearly 7,000 allied troops were killed during the battle of Chosin, and an estimated 30,000 Chinese died. At the end of the fighting, John Yancey was the only officer left on Hill 1282. And he had taken three serious wounds within the space of 2 days.

Since that time, Mr. President, numerous marines have come forward to attest to the heroism and courage of John Yancey. All of them are only right and proper in their claims, since he is in every way a hero in the tradition of America's fighting men.

Had John Yancey's superior officers survived the battle at the Chosin Reservoir, there is no doubt they would have testified to his unquestioned deserving of the Congressional Medal of Honor. There are numerous men throughout the country who are now willing and anxious to step forward and make that testimony in their absence.

And in that spirit my colleague Senator BUMPERS and I are today introducing legislation to ask the President—in the name of the Congress—to award the Medal of Honor to John Yancey. And I wish to quote from this proposed bill in closing, Mr. President: "In recognition of acts of gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of life above and beyond the call of duty."

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce with my distinguished colleague, Senator PRYOR, a bill to award a man of valor, dignity, and unlimited selflessness the Congressional Medal of Honor; that man, Mr. President, is Capt. John Yancey.

Capt. John Yancey, affectionately known as "Cap'n John," displayed on a subzero day in December 1950 extraordinary bravery and courage in the face of immense odds and inhuman circumstances. On that day he led the 2d platoon of Easy Company, 7th Regiment, 1st Marine Division

FMF on a heroic assault of Hill 1282, which lies north of Yudam-Ni near the mammoth Chosin Reservoir just south of the Yalu River on the Sino-Korean frontier. Against a tide of 120,000 Chinese Communist troops, the 15,000 allied soldiers waged a battle against virtually unprecedented odds. Capt. John Yancey's leadership and sacrifice during this fight prevented Hill 1282 from being lost and in turn prevented the remainder of the Fifth and Seventh Marine regiments from being overrun by the seemingly endless waves of enemy troops.

It was not simply the leadership and encouragement of Captain Yancey throughout that battle that won him the undying respect and admiration of those he led through this trial, but his perseverance during that night was in spite of three wounds he had suffered to the head. It was this fierce determination that gave his men the tenacity to continue the fight and retain control of the strategically vital Hill 1282 till reinforcements arrived.

The firefight on Hill 1282 earned Captain Yancey the Navy Cross, but this was not his first decoration for outstanding performance of his duties. His story began the day following the tragic bombing of Pearl Harbor in 1941, when he left the sanctity of a small farm in southern Arkansas to be a marine—"one of the first to fight." His first Navy Cross was awarded following an ambush on him and a handful of his men in the grueling jungle of Guadalcanal. From that day forward his loyalty to his country and the men under his command is a story of extraordinary patriotism.

The men he fought with and risked his life for have documented his bravery, and I conclude with a quotation from an affidavit of Charles Griffin, a soldier under "Cap'n John's" command: "John Yancey's personal courage, disregard for painful wounds, and leadership were in the highest tradition of the Naval service and above and beyond the call of duty.

By Mr. MATHIAS:

S. 1071. A bill to amend the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FOREIGN SOVEREIGN IMMUNITIES ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act [FSIA], in force now for 9 years, restricts the immunity given to foreign governments by our courts. Today, I introduce a bill that will clarify and strengthen it.

We live in a world that daily grows more interdependent. In 1970, international trade accounted for only 6 percent of our GNP. Today, it is over 12 percent. One of the best ways to facilitate trade is to provide a legitimate way to adjudicate disputes. This is especially true when one of the parties is a government or a government agency, and we run into the hoary doctrine of sovereign immunity.

Like most legal concepts, the doctrine of sovereign immunity is an ancient one, reaching all the way back to the 14th century B.C., when Egyptian Pharaohs acknowledged the mutual sovereignty and equality of neighboring kings. Briefly stated, this principle assets that one sovereign should not submit to the will of another sovereign. If rulers were subjected to the jurisdiction of other states, their interests would be compromised. A sovereign's immunity from the jurisdiction of foreign courts was a natural corollary of the recognition of the equal status of rulers.

The doctrine of sovereign immunity was early recognized by our courts. Chief Justice John Marshall in Schooner Exchange versus M'Faddon noted that the "perfect equality and absolute independence of sovereigns" was recognized by the law and practice of other nations. Beyond international comity, sovereign immunity rests on the separation of powers in our Constitution. In the past, to avoid embarrassment to those responsible for the conduct of the Nation's foreign relations, the courts generally deferred to the executive branch in cases involving foreign states. They did so even when the executive branch might have found it more political for the courts to resolve a dispute and spare it that prickly duty.

As foreign governments engaged more and more in normal commerical enterprises, they became increasingly involved in routine legal and business disputes. Due to the absolute immunity from jurisdiction accorded foreign governments, private litigants had difficulty getting these disputes resolved. This led to an absurd situation, where government-controlled foreign enterprises or businesses received preferential treatment in U.S. courts over their privately run competitors.

These government-owned firms could ignore their obligations under contracts, evade responsibility for their own negligence and otherwise violate the requirements of law by invoking a legal fiction—that their activity served some governmental purpose and should therefore be entitled to sovereign immunity.

In response to this unsatisfactory state of affairs, the State Department in the early 1950's began advocating immunity only for public or official acts of a government and not private or commercial activities. "This restrictive theory of sovereign immunity" was recognized by the courts. In Victory Transport, sovereign immunity was seen as "a derogation from the normal exercise of the jurisdiction by the courts and should be accorded only in clear cases."

In 1976, Congress codified the restrictive theory in the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. This codification has extricated the State Department from the sticky business of deciding which government is entitled to immunity, and for what activities. It gives the courts that power, and they have exercised it expertly. Further, the FSIA ended the immunity that foreign states enjoyed from the execution of judgments won by private parties in court. The FSIA gives litigants not only a right to due process, but in most cases a remedy as well. Unfortunately, there are still some gaps.

The amendments I introduced today fill the gaps in the FSIA. Simply stated, they perfect the jurisdiction of the court and provide for better enforcement and execution of judgments once they are rendered by the court.

Experience has demonstrated that the FSIA's current provisions for adjudication of expropriation claims fail to provide an adequate remedy for many Americans who are the victims of foreign expropriations. This is true because the courts continue to apply a legal anachronism, the act of State doctrine, as a bar to adjudication of expropriation claims. In deference to this doctrine, our courts now often dismiss cases properly within their jurisdiction when the dispute requires them to judge the validity of an act of a foreign government. The most notorious examples date from Fidel Castro's expropriation of the assets of U.S. citizens after his takeover in 1959. Even though the takeovers were generally acknowledged to be both confiscatory and discriminatory and thus in violation of international law, U.S. courts dismissed the claims of the expropriated Americans trying to attach Cuban assets in this country.

Congress thought it cured this ill when it adopted the Sabintino amendment to the Foreign Assistance Act in 1964 but the courts have interpreted that statute very narrowly. We must free our courts from this self-imposed restraint and end these dismissals by reflex. The courts should be encouraged to adjudicate expropriation cases that are in violation of international law. In cases where the FSIA confers jurisdiction, this bill excludes the use of the act of state doctrine to bar adjudication.

These amendments also clarify the jurisdiction of the courts by expressly defining a commercial activity to include debt securities and guarantees issued by foreign states. Although the FSIA already has that effect, a clarifying amendment would reassure the cour[illegible].

The amendments enhance the power of parties to have arbitration awards recognized and enforced in American courts, most importantly in the area of arbitration. The procedure of submitting disputes to an impartial arbitrator extends back to the earliest days of international law. Thucydides writes that a treaty of alliance between Sparta and Argos in 418 B.C. stipulated that they would take their differences to arbitration on fair and equal terms. Once again international arbitration has gained prominence as a mechanism for resolving international disputes, this time, commercial disputes between governments and private individuals or corporations. Under this procedure, an arbitration clause is written into the agreement negotiated between the corporation and the government of the country with which it wishes to do business. In this way any dispute that arises can be resolved by the arbitrator.

Obviously, unless the arbitration agreement is enforceable, the arbitration is meaningless. Recent decisions in the U.S. courts suggest that serious uncertainties surround the enforcement of international arbitration awards. In one case, the court, using the act of state doctrine, failed to recognize an arbitration award against a foreign government.

This amendment will reassure businesses that the international arbitration process will work. It does so by amending the FSIA to say that an agreement to arbitrate constitutes a waiver of immunity in an action to enforce that agreement or the resultant award.

Prior to passage of the FSIA, there was no effective means of serving a process upon a foreign state. So litigants resorted to prejudgment attachment of a foreign government's property. That would at least get them into court. But then the FSIA prohibited jurisdictional prejudgment attachment. In its place, it provided a mechanism for service of process upon a foreign state.

However, the Iran claims litigation has demonstrated the need for reconsideration of prejudgment attachment of assets, when there is evidence of imminent removal of assets by a foreign government in order to avoid execution.

To ensure that right to a meaningful judgment, this bill would amend the FSIA to authorize prejudgment attachment to secure satisfaction against an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state under carefully defined conditions. These conditions will provide a better balance between the due process of litigants and the foreign policy concerns of the U.S. Government.

Providing a right without a remedy is neither good policy nor good law. My bill corrects that situation by allowing execution of a judgment against a broader range of commercial property owned by a foreign state; making it easier to execute a judgment against the commercial assets of a foreign government.

In admiralty cases, this bill would restrict penalties for improper arrest of a vessel to the damages incurred during the detention—at present, such penalties are excessive. Litigants would retain a right to go to court. Finally, this bill allows an aggrieved party to bring an action against the ship itself. This eliminates the serious uncertainties that exist under the current law due to the difficulty in ascertaining the true ownership of a vessel and the obvious mobility of such property. Litigants in U.S. courts should not have to watch helplessly as their only remedy sails away.

Some of my colleagues may be familiar with measures I introduced in the 97th Congress on the enforcement of arbitral awards and the restrictions on the use of the act of state doctrine. The reform I am proposing today applies only to modifying the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. However, those earlier measures and this bill have a common purpose—the advancement of the rule of law worldwide through the codification of recognized legal standards. For a law-abiding nation like the United States, a movement in this direction can only work to our benefit.

We don't want litigants in our courts to be the "hit and run" victims of an outmoded concept of sovereign immunity. These amendments to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act are consonant with the way we do business today and will encourage our export effort. With a U.S. trade deficit of over $123 billion, nothing should have a higher priority. These amendments are strongly endorsed by the American Bar Association and are the first priority on its international law agenda.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. QUAYLE:

S.J. Res. 130. Joint resolution designating the week beginning on November 10, 1985, as "National Blood Pressure Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL BLOOD PRESSURE AWARENESS WEEK

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, it is my pleasure today to introduce a joint resolution to designate the week of November 10–16, 1985, as "National Blood Pressure Awareness Week."

Elevated blood pressure, or hypertension, has been a health problem for many, many years; a discussion of it appeared in the oldest medical textbook in written history, which was written approximately 3,000 to 5,000 years ago. Today elevated blood pressure, or hypertension, occurs in over 60 million Americans. While we do not fully understand the causes of 95 percent of hypertension, we certainly do know the consequences of a failure to bring it under control; it is a major factor in the incidence of stroke, heart attack, and other cardiovascular system diseases. In addition, the prevalence of hypertension in the black population of the United States has been found to be considerably higher than the rate in the white population, and hypertension-related deaths are disproportionately higher among black individuals. In short, the statistics show that blacks get hypertension earlier in life, at higher levels, and with greater frequency.

Particularly distressing is the fact that while a simple, painless test can detect this condition, a large number of hypertensive individuals remain unaware that they are affected by this "silent killer." Although more than 700,000 Americans died from strokes and heart attacks during 1982, a reduction of 30 percent in cardiovascular disease-related mortality occurred between 1970 and 1980. Moreover, the death rate for hypertension has fallen by 53 percent since 1968. This decline can be partially attributed to increased awareness and better control of blood pressure.

In addition to reductions in needless mortality and morbidity which can accrue through blood pressure control, increases in productivity and decreases in health care expenditures can also be effected. In 1983, $2 billion in employee earnings, representing more than 29 million work days, were lost because of cardiovascular diseases which affect more than 30 percent of the work force. In total, this year, these diseases are expected to cost the United States economy $72 billion in direct medical expenses and lost output due to disabilities. Worksite demonstration projects sponsored by the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute have revealed that absenteeism and health care expenditures are greater for individuals with hypertension. More importantly, both absenteeism and health care expenditures were reduced as blood pressure was returned to the normal range.

The importance of blood pressure control was emphasized in the National Heart, Blood Vessel, Lung, and Blood Act of 1972, and again in the 1980 report of the U.S. Surgeon General, entitled "Promoting Health/Preventing Disease: Objectives for the Nation." The latter report serves as the framework for Public Health Service programs to improve the health of the American people. The worksite projects noted above are one example of many programs which have demonstrated that the detrimental effects of cardiovascular disease can be diminished by blood pressure control.

On any grounds—quality of life, productivity, or economics—increased attention to the identification of individuals with hypertension and greater awareness of the consequences of elevated blood pressure is extremely important to all Americans.

I am, therefore, pleased to introduce this joint resolution in order to focus additional attention on this subject during the same week that 10–12,000 health professionals and concerned citizens will meet here in Washington, DC, for the annual meeting of the American Heart Association. I urge all my colleagues in the Senate to take this opportunity to promote enhanced awareness of the problems associated with hypertension and, at the same time, to work toward reducing the terrible human losses associated with it. I also would like to invite my colleagues to join with me and cosponsor this important effort.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 130

Whereas diseases resulting from hypertension cause needless mortality and morbidity which can be reduced if hypertension is discovered through blood pressure screening;

Whereas sixty million Americans are hypertensive;

Whereas hypertension is a major factor in five hundred thousand strokes and one hundred and seventy-five thousand stroke-related deaths annually as well as more than one million five hundred thousand heart attacks and five hundred and sixty-seven thousand heart attack-related deaths annually;

Whereas the prevalence of hypertension in black males is 33 percent higher than in white males, and the prevalence of hypertension in black females is twice that of their counterparts;

Whereas twenty-nine million workdays, representing $2,000,000,000 in earnings, are lost each year because of cardiovascular diseases;

Whereas the risk of the major cardiovascular diseases is directly related to hypertension and even mild elevation in blood pressure may result in substantial risk of illness;

Whereas much of the 30 per centum reduction in mortality between 1970 and 1980 for stroke, hypertension heart disease and other cardiovascular system disease can be partially attributed to increased awareness and better control of blood pressure; and

Whereas increased blood pressure screening will identify greater numbers of Americans at risk for hypertension-related cardiovascular disease and encourage these Americans to seek treatment to control their blood pressure: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning on November 10, 1985, is hereby designated as "National Blood Pressure Awareness Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 154—PAYING TRIBUTE TO AMERICAN VETERANS OF WORLD WAR II ON THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY OF V-E DAY

Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. BYRD, Mr. DOLE, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. BOREN, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. CHILES, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. DIXON, Mr. DODD, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. EVANS, Mr. EXON, Mr. FORD, Mr. GARN, Mr. GLENN, Mr. GORE, Mr. GORTON, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. HART, Mr. HATFIELD, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. HECHT, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. HELMS, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. INOUYE, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. KERRY, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. LONG, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. NUNN, Mr. PELL, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. ROTH, Mr. RUDMAN, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SASSER, Mr. SIMON, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. TRIBLE, Mr. WARNER, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. ZORINSKY) submitted the following resolution; which was placed on the calendar:

S. RES. 154

Whereas on the morning of May 7, 1945 in Reims, France, Colonel General Alfred Jodl of the German High Command signed the terms of unconditional surrender on behalf of his government, and Lt. General Walter B. Smith, Supreme Allied Commander Eisenhower's Chief of Staff, signed for the Allies; and those terms were ratified in Berlin on May 9, 1945;

Whereas the free world has traditionally celebrated May 8th as the day of Allied "Victory in Europe" over Germany, or V-E Day;

Whereas May 8, 1985 marks the fortieth anniversary of V-E Day;

Whereas that victory represented, as the world later came to realize, the triumph of good over unspeakable evil, and the promise of a peaceful future for a Europe ravaged by the bloodiest war in its history;

Whereas V-E Day was a day for which millions had worked and fought and prayed and died during that terrible war;

Whereas the victory was made possible by the selfless heroism of the 15,000,000 Americans and the millions of other Allied servicemen who fought valiantly to prevent Hitler's onslaught;

Whereas many American servicemen willingly risked their lives in service to the Nation to defend the democratic ideals and respect for human rights upon which the Nation was founded; and

Whereas 407,000 American servicemen were called upon to make the ultimate sacrifice for their country during the war:

Now, therefore, be it Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that—

1. On the fortieth anniversary of V-E Day, the deep gratitude of the Nation is expressed to the American servicemen who bravely fought against the advance of Nazi tyranny in World War II, and the Nation honors those who gave their lives in the cause;

2. V-E Day belongs to the veterans who made victory possible, and to the families who gave our servicemen courage and sent loved ones into battle for the Nation; and

3. The Nation recognizes the enormous debt owed to the veterans for patriotism and bravery on the battlefields of World War II.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to submit a resolution to pay tribute to the American veterans of World War II on the 40th anniversary of V-E Day. Mr. President, 77 of my colleagues have joined me in sponsoring this resolution. In addition, I am grateful to have the support and endorsements of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States of America, the Catholic War Veterans of the United States of America, and the Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America.

Every year on May 8, the world celebrates the Allied "Victory in Europe," known as V-E Day. That victory represented, as the world later came to realize, the triumph of good over unspeakable evil, and the promise of a peaceful future for a Europe ravaged by the bloodiest war in its history. May 8 is particularly special this year since it marks the 40th anniversary of the end of the European chapter of World War II.

It is fitting that we take the time to acknowledge that V-E Day, and our Allied victory, was made possible by the selfless heroism of the 15,000,000 Americans and the millions of other Allied servicemen who fought valiantly in World War II. We owe a great debt to the many American servicemen who willingly risked their lives in service to our country to defend the democratic ideals and respect for human rights upon which it was founded.

Through this resolution, we seek to express our Nation's deep gratitude to the American servicemen who bravely fought against the advance of Nazi tyranny, and to their families, who gave them courage and sent them into battle for our country. We also honor the 407,000 American servicemen who were called upon to make the ultimate sacrifice for their country.

Forty years after V-E Day, the light of history has shone on the events of World War II. It has illuminated just how much we owe our veterans for their patriotism and bravery on the battlefields of World War II. The world can never repay that debt. But we can take the opportunity, on this historic anniversary of V-E Day, to express our appreciation to our veterans for their outstanding contribution to our country and our world.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letters from the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States of America, the Catholic War Veterans of the United States of America, and the Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks for the information of my colleagues.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES,

The VFW strongly supports and encourages the timely passage of this much deserved resolution.

Sincerely,

BILLY RAY CAMERON,
National Commander-in-Chief.

Sincerely,

SAMUEL GREENBERG,
National Commander.

SENATE RESOLUTION 155—CONDEMNING THE ACTIONS OF THE ETHIOPIAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. CHILES (for himself, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. PELL, and Mr. SASSER) submitted the following resolution, which was ordered held at the desk until the close of business on May 6, 1985, by unanimous consent:

S. RES. 155

Whereas, the current extended drought in more than twenty African countries has placed 10 million or more people at risk of starvation; and

Whereas, the United States and other donors around the world are engaging in an unprecedented campaign to curb further deaths in Ethiopia and other African countries; and

Whereas, the success of these emergency assistance efforts depends largely on the cooperation and support of the authorities within each country receiving assistance; and

Whereas, there remains continuing evidence of widespread brutality, diversion of food assistance and disruption of relief efforts by the government of Ethiopia, including destroying numerous villages and farms; and

Whereas, the government of Ethiopia has brutally removed people from the famine relief camp at Ibnet, forcing more than 50,000 famine victims, including thousands of young children, into what can be described as a "death march." Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate,

(1) Condemns the actions of the Ethiopian government in the forced evacuation of the Ibnet refugee camp; and

(2) Condemns the continuing actions of the Ethiopian government to disrupt and divert international relief efforts to help the needy in Ethiopia.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, in recent months the world has responded with an outpouring of concern and generosity to efforts to end the famine in Ethiopia. The almost unimaginable suffering that has taken place in that nation has moved us all. Our common goal has been to bring food and supplies to thousands of the starving, and to bring an end to the horror of fellow human beings dying from malnutrition.

Against this background of one of the worst human tragedies of the modern era, there is mounting evidence of an unspeakable campaign or policy by the Marxist military Government of Ethiopia to pursue its own political goals with brutal and deadly force and no regard for the welfare of suffering Ethiopian citizens.

Recent news reports in the Washington Post and other media have disclosed actions by the Ethiopian regime that should shock and outrage any person or government with a concern with the basic rights of human beings. Reports are coming out that the Ethiopian Army forceably evacuated and burned the Ibnet famine relief camp. Troops herded more than 50,000 famine victims, including several thousand children under 5, out of Ibnet. What was a general feeding, child nutrition and medical center is now a blackened plain.

Obviously, these people, still weak, undernourished and suffering from disease, are not in a condition to be relocated. And yet the leaders of the Worker's Party of Ethiopia have initiated what can accurately be called a death march. To clear the camp, residents were killed. Pregnant women, chased by soldiers, miscarried. Grass huts were set afire while still occupied. Private relief nurses report that hundreds of very sick children have disappeared.

Now tens of thousands of weak and often sick people are wandering in the rugged highlands of Ethiopia. Some will have to walk for 2 weeks to reach their former homes. Many, perhaps even half, will die of exposure, hunger, or illness. Seventeen bodies have already been counted along the road leading east from Ibnet. Officials of the Ethiopian Worker's Party have ordered that no one from the regions of Welo and Gondar is to be given food, water or medical assistance.

And to what fate are these people being consigned. The Wollo region, the eventual destination of many of the evacuees, remains an inhospitable area with little seed, very limited supplies of farm tools and almost no food. In essence those that survive the march are condemned to the same fate that drove them to be refugees in the first place.

Mr. President, in a time that has witnessed much cruelty and inhumane treatment by ruthless regimes; in a time that has seen human rights trampled for the goals of some twisted ideology, this action by the Ethiopian Government is still almost impossible to comprehend. I cannot believe that this outrage has not galvanized world opinion to condemn this outlaw government. I cannot believe that the United Nations has not moved to condemn. I cannot believe that the civilized world has not protested this affront to civilization.

Mr. President, I am submitting a resolution to provide an opportunity for the U.S. Senate to express its outrage and condemnation. We must not let this despicable action by a so-called government escape the censure it so warrants.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

NATIONAL BIPARTISAN COMMISSION ON CENTRAL AMERICA

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, it is 16 months since the report of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America was presented to the Nation. Twelve distinguished Americans of both parties, under the leadership of Henry Kissinger, offered an analysis of the situation on Central America that has survived well the passage of time. I am proud to have served as a Senate advisor to the Commission.

On April 23, the Senate voted to support the democratic resistance to the nine Sandinista leaders in Nicaragua. The House subsequently failed to support the democratic resistance and its call for national reconciliation. There are encouraging signs that the other body now recognizes its mistake and will shortly move to help Nicaragua reclaim its revolutionary promises of peace and freedom.

An excellent article in today's Christian Science Monitor provides some interesting comments on the relationship between the report of the bipartisan Commission and the decisions Congress must make regarding Nicaragua.

I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

NICARAGUA'S REWARD

(By John Hughes)

Daniel Ortega, Nicaragua's leader, has been in Moscow, and although the photographs show no smile flickering across his ever-grace face, it must have been a satisfactory visit.

Before he left Managua, there were reports that Mr. Ortega was seeking $200 million in aid from the Soviets. Nobody knows whether he got it. The Soviets are usually coy about announcing the size and content of their aid packages.

But the Soviet reception for Ortega was fulsome. He was warmly received by the top brass, including Mikhail Gorbachev and Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko. The nuanced mumbo jumbo of the communique issued afterward is being interpreted by the experts as meaning that Ortega got a bundle.

And why not? The Soviets have reason to be pleased with their Nicaraguan protégé and the direction he is moving their Central American aspirations.

For the Soviets, the Nicaraguan revolution of 1979 was as significant as the Cuban revolution 20 years earlier. Viktor Volski, president of the Soviet Association of Friendship with Latin American Countries, called it a "model" to be followed. Boris Ponomarev, a national party secretary in charge of relations with noncommunist countries, included Central America for the first time among third-world states undergoing revolutionary changes of "a socialist orientation." Mr. Ponomarev was one of the officials Ortega huddled with in Moscow. Marshal Nikolai Ogarkov, then the top Soviet military man, put Nicaragua on a level with Cuba in terms of its potential opportunity for the Soviet Union.

The cornerstone of Moscow's Central American policy is, of course, Cuba. With its Air Force of more than 200 combat jets, its assault helicopters and other military paraphernalia, Cuba is the No. 2 military power in Latin America, after Brazil. It has dispatched combat troops to Africa, and "advisers" by the hundreds of Grenada, in the past, and Nicaragua.

But according to one group of experts, "Cuba's island geography complicates its sponsorship of subversion. Nicaragua suffers no such limitation . . . as a mainland platform; therefore, Nicaragua is a crucial steppingstone for Cuban and Soviet efforts to promote armed insurgency in Central America." These are not the ravings of some right-wing group of ideological zealots. This is the dispassionate and clinical assessment of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, the Kissinger Commission. The commission included diverse members who, while they may have had differing points of view about President Reagan's policy on Nicaragua, seemed united in their feeling that Nicaragua's present Marxist regime is bad news for the United States.

The report was completed in January of 1985. But even then there were no illusions about the unsavory ideological character of the Sandinista regime.

The commission said the Nicaraguan government volunteered an intelligence briefing that "left no reasonable doubt that Nicaragua is tied into the Cuban, and thereby the Soviet, intelligence network."

The commisssion said it encountered no leader in Central America who did not express "deep foreboding" about the impact of a militarized, totalitarian Nicaragua on the peace and security of the region.

Even though it finished deliberations more than a year ago, it had some prescient thoughts about the polarization of viewpoints in the US on Nicaragua.

"What is being tested," the commission concluded, "is not so much the ability of the US to provide large resources but rather the realism of our political attitudes, the harmony of Congressional and Administration priorities, and the adaptability of the military and civil departments of the Executive."

They are words worth pondering as Congress denies aid to the anti-Sandinistas, as a frustrated administration looks to sanctions against Nicaragua, and as Moscow gives Daniel Ortega his reward.●

PRESS COVERAGE OF THE WAR IN AFGHANISTAN

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, what is the most pressing need of the courageous Mujahideen, the freedom fighters of Afghanistan who have held 115,000 Soviet troops at bay for 5 years? Aside from the obvious need for greater material assistance from sympathetic nations, these warriors for the cause of liberty ask that their struggle—and the struggle of their nation for independence—be publicized. They believe that just a small measure of awareness of their struggle would galvanize public attention behind their cause, providing them with the material and psychological assistance they so desperately need in taking on the world's most powerful, most destructive military machine.

Well, if the Mujahideen hoped for a wave of coverage of the war in Afghanistan, if they expected a river of information flowing through the media to the public at large, they have instead received a trickle. A light smattering of occasional bits, buried deep within the newspaper or missed with the blink of an eye on the television.

To be sure, one should not minimize the difficulties involved in reporting stories from Afghanistan in a timely and reliable fashion. The Soviets have made coverage of the war from within Afghanistan a deadly gambit; journalists apprehended there, they say, will be summarily executed.

Additionally, lack of coverage of Afghanistan is not the case for every representative of the collective media, and it would be unfair to lump all of this Nation's newspapers, magazines, radio, and television in this same shameful category. The New York Times has posted a correspondent in Pakistan to cover major events in the war within Afghanistan. More significantly still, the Washington Times has on a regular basis printed reports of the war, as well as its ramifications throughout the region. One such article appeared Wednesday, which described the success of the Mujahideen in disrupting the seventh anniversary celebration of the Marxist revolution in Afghanistan. I ask that the article appear in the RECORD following the conclusion of my remarks. Finally, many smaller papers have covered this struggle in some measure.

Nevertheless, I cannot help but feel that we are doing a grave disservice to the Afghan freedom fighters by not covering their struggle in greater depth and with greater frequency. This sentiment, I have learned, is one shared by many, including representatives of the media themselves. Not long ago, Cliff Taylor, editor of WHEB radio station in Portsmouth, NH, broadcast an editorial castigating the media at large for their coverage of Afghanistan. The occasion was the conclusion of a visit by two Mujahideen commanders to the United States in April. The visit of these courageous warriors for freedom and the independence of their homeland received, to put it mildly, sparse attention. Mr. President, it is my hope that in the future the media will join with us in presenting the war in Afghanistan to the public for what it is: the most compelling fight of our time against the onslaught of totalitarian oppression. I ask the aforementioned editorial be printed in the RECORD following the conclusion of my remarks.

The material follows:

EDITORIAL

Two distinguished commanders of freedom fighters in Afghanistan were recently visitors to the United States. Did you know that? When visited Communists turn up, so do the liberal news media. We see almost nightly coverage of Communists from El Salvador and the Nicaraguan Sandinistas or roving "good will" ambassadors from the Soviet Union at Washington cocktail receptions.

But, when two freedom fighters from Afghanistan tour the country? Media black out! You probably don't know this, but two commanders of Afghanistan fighters battling to throw the Soviet Union troops out of their country visited the United States recently. Their purpose was to try to inform Americans of the desperate situation against the Soviet invaders.

To coin a phrase, "better they should have stayed in bed." Their news coverage by all the important, but liberal, media network was zilch! For your information they toured major cities on both coasts of the United States. They received pledges of support during news conferences from various cities, but strangely our national liberal media found more important things to report . . . like "talking heads" at Geneva . . . or the gorilla with a new pet kitten.

Brigadier Safi was Chief of Special Forces of the Royal Afghan Army. He trained with our U.S. Special Forces and with the British Special Air Service. He has personally led his men against Soviet forces.

General Commander Khan has helped inflict heavy losses on the Soviet invaders. In one night last September he helped carry out "Operation Blackout", by blowing up 170 electric towers that plunged the Afghan capital city of Kabul . . . a Soviet stronghold . . . into total darkness. . . left the city without power.

These gentlemen are prime news prospects, but they were given their own "news blackout." They were prepared to give eyewitness accounts of Soviet chemical warfare. They had photos of children maimed, blinded, disfigured by "booby trapped toys" scattered by the Soviets.

Oh, they had the stories all right . . . news we Americans should know about, but our so-called "free press" . . . the liberal press at least . . . chose to ignore them.

In a competitive business, how come at least one didn't try for a "scoop?" Do you suppose . . .? Naw. . . there couldn't be a conspiracy! Could there?

BLAST KILLS 1 AT KABUL PARADE

NEW DELHI, INDIA.—At least one person was killed and 48 wounded when a bomb exploded at a parade held last week in Kabul to mark the seventh anniversary of the Marxist revolution in Afghanistan, Western diplomatic sources said here yesterday.

The blast, suspected to be the work of Mujahideen guerrillas, occurred on April 27 as the Babrak Karmal government tried to put on a show of strength in the capital.

On April 18–19, the Mujahideen reportedly staged one of its biggest ambushes, blowing up more than 150 military vehicles on a 15-mile stretch of road between Kabul and Gardez; in southern Paktia province, the diplomatic sources said. According to Kabul radio monitored here, the Mujahideen also launched a rocket attack on an air base at Bagram.

The raids prompted reprisal attacks by Soviet forces that resulted in nearly 300 civilian deaths and the capture of large quantities of arms and ammunition in the Koh Safi region, the radio said.●

CANADIAN CONSERVATION CORP PROGRAMS: KATIMAVIK AND ONET/85

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I wish to draw my colleagues' attention to two noteworthy conservation corp programs our neighbor to the north—Canada—has initiated.

The first is Katimavik. Funded at $50 million, this program enrolls 17 to 24 year-olds to perform conservation and community service work at 240 sites across the country. Tasks include improving spawning beds, restoring historic sites, evaluating human impact on the tundra, and promoting recycling in government buildings. Enrollees are essentially volunteers, receiving $1 daily, and a $1,000 bonus for completing 9 months of service. Last year, in conjunction with the UN Tree Program, Katimavik volunteers planted 2 million trees.

Another, and most exciting, program is ONET/85, which will commence in mid-July. Under this project, 100,000 Canadian youths and 2,000 delegates from other countries will gather along the banks of the mighty St. Lawrence River for an unprecedented ecological operation: the removal of some 9,000 tons of solid waste, trash, and other debris polluting 3,000 kilometers of riverbank. ONET/85 is a most ambitious and laudable undertaking during this, the International Year of the Youth.

Mr. President, I would note that the funding for Katimavik is roughly the per capita equivalent of a $500 million Federal expenditure here in the United States. Yet the administration saw fit to veto a bill last year (H.R. 999) authorizing an American Conservation Corps at $50 million. Would that we act as farsightedly about our natural and human resources as the Canadians.●

HEALTH CARE FOR THE ELDERLY

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I would like to call my colleagues attention to a program sponsored in my home State of Indiana that is making a much needed effort to help health professionals meet the health care needs of our Nation's elderly. Specifically, this program was designed to assist pharmacists to better address the needs of our elderly population. Such efforts in the private sector are becoming more and more important when we look at the changing demographics in our country. By the year 2000, there will be 36 million elderly Americans, comprising 13 percent of the total population.

Dr. Charles Brown and Eugene Step are to be congratulated for their pioneering work in this area. I am pleased to say that the White House Office of Private Initiatives saw fit to recently commend them for their work.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Indianapolis News describing this program in more detail.

NEW PROGRAM TARGETS HEALTH CARE FOR AGED

(By Lou Hiner)

WASHINGTON.—Purdue University and Eli Lilly & Co. are among the participants in a new educational program to help "practicing health professionals" meet the needs of the nation's 28 million aged persons.

The program, sponsored by the American Association of Colleges of Pharmacy (AACP), was discussed at a National Press Club conference. College deans, congressional and government representatives and persons associated with 20 different health fields attended.

Among the long-range hopes of the undertaking is better cooperation and coordination between pharmacists and doctors in treating older persons.

The curriculum proposed for pharmacy schools includes a 1,100-page textbook for students and a 350-page guide for the instructors. Both publications cover such topics as drug use, nutrition, common disorders, physiology, death and dying and patient communication.

Charles Brown, assistant professor of clinical pharmacy at Purdue, is among the authors of the 30-chapter textbook. Also attending the conference from Purdue were Pharmacy Dean Varrow Tyler and Assistant Dean George Spratto.

Lilly was represented by Eugene Step, pharmaceutical division president, and William Pillow, manager of professional relations.

COMMENDATIONS

Brown and Step received commendations at the luncheon session from the White House Office of Private Initiatives for their roles in developing the curriculum. The scrolls were signed by President Reagan.

The training program is designed for use at pharmacy colleges and also in an ongoing educational plan for practicing pharmacists. The later will be given college credits for studies completed in their home communities.

Dr. Carl Trinca, AACP executive director, explained to the conference:

"The comprehensive curriculum brings special attention to pharmacy as the first health profession to respond in this manner to the growing demand for training health professionals about the special needs of the elderly, the fastest-growing segment of our population."

Dr. Monroe Gilmour, a director of the American Association of Retired Persons, praised the significance of the program, saying:

"It is spendid that in this day of changing pharmacy, physicians and pharmacists are going to be assuming a more cooperative role. This program will aid the flow of information as pharmacists and others in the health professions increase their understanding of the needs of our aged citizens."

PHARMACY PRACTICE AND GERIATRIC PATIENT

The American Association of Colleges of Pharmacy (AACP) is proud to present a new pharmacy education curriculum, "Pharmacy Practice and the Geriatric Patient". The curriculum was developed in response to needs identified by the White House Commission on Aging, the Congress and the Department of Health and Human Services for a comprehensive curriculum for geriatrics and gerontology.

The extensive 30-chapter curriculum, to be distributed to the nation's 72 colleges of pharmacy, is a result of a four-year effort by 70 authors and peer reviewers from 18 states. Elements of the curriculum include chapters on: characteristics of the elderly and theories of aging, physical and emotional changes in the elderly, drug therapy, special communications needs and death and dying.

The curriculum is designed for use in pharmacy settings. Yet it provides unique opportunities for individuals in all health disciplines to better utilize their professional skills in serving the elderly. It fosters positive approaches to geriatric care by increasing understanding of the physical, social and emotional needs of the elderly.

The AACP Geriatric Curriculum Project, jointly sponsored by Eli Lilly and Company, is an example of the benefits—in this case for the elderly and for health professionals—to be derived from private sector initiatives.

AACP invites you and your colleagues to become acquainted with the curriculum and consider its use in your work with the Aging community.●
